Mr. McCUMBER. I move to amend the bill on page 5, line 15, before the word "dollars," by striking out "fifteen" and inserting "twenty." I will say that this amendment is proposed upon additional evidence which has been submitted to the committee since the report upon which the rating was made in the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 15, before the word "dollars," it is proposed to strike out "fifteen" and to insert "twenty," so as to read:

The name of Henrietta Hayes, widow of William Hayes, late first lieutenant Company C, Thirteenth Regiment New Jersey Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEAN. I am obliged to the Senator from North Dakota.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MERRIMAC RIVER BRIDGE AT TYNGS ISLAND, MASSACHUSETTS.

The bill (S. 4809) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Merrimac River at Tyngs Island, Massachusetts, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVISON CHEMICAL COMPANY, OF BALTIMORE, MD.

The bill (S. 4632) for the relief of the Davison Chemical Company, of Baltimore, Md., was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEAN. Is there a report accompanying that bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a report accompanying the bill.

Mr. KEAN. Let the report be read, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

Mr. KEAN. Let the bill go over, Mr. President. In glancing at the report, I notice that there is an omission in it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from New Jersey, the bill will go over without prejudice.

H. R. KING.

The bill (H. R. 1702) to reimburse H. R. King was announced as next in order.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, we ought to know something about that bill. I presume there is either a report accompanying it or that some Senator is prepared to state the ground upon which the appropriation contained therein is rested.

Mr. KEAN. Let the bill go over.

Mr. BACON. I do not ask that the bill go over; but I should like to know something about it before it is passed. It is the Senator from New Jersey who asks that the bill go over.

Mr. KEAN. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] who reported the bill is not present. Let it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from New Jersey, the bill will go over.

PACIFIC PEARL MULLETT.

The bill (S. 1517) for the relief of Pacific Pearl Mullett, administratrix of the estate of the late Alfred B. Mullett, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BURKETT. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will allow the facts upon which this bill is based to be stated. I will state to the Senator that a similar bill has passed the Senate frequently; that it has had the examination and approval of the Committee on Claims of this body several times, and I think, although I am not prepared to state it with absolute certainty, that it has also several times passed the other House. Unless the Senator knows some reason to object to the bill, I hope the simple fact that he is not informed about the bill will not influence him in opposition to it, in view of what I have stated that it has several times passed the Senate.

Mr. BURKETT. I will say that I do know something about the claim, and that is the reason I objected to it.

Mr. BACON. Very well, if the Senator has objection to it.

Mr. BURKETT. I do not want to take time to discuss it now, and therefore I ask that it go over.

Mr. BACON. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

UNITED STATES NATIONAL CEMETERY AT MEXICO CITY, MEXICO.

Mr. HEYBURN obtained the floor.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a little bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2248) for the improvement of the United States National Cemetery at Mexico City, Mexico.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. KEAN. Is there a report with that bill?

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator from New Jersey will allow me, I think I can explain the bill briefly. The Government of the United States owns the cemetery in fee simple, and in that cemetery there are buried a great many soldiers of the war of 1847–48. I now send to the desk and ask the Secretary to read a letter which has been sent to me in regard to the matter, and afterwards I desire to make a little further statement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF TENNESSEE,
City of Mexico, February 12, 1908.

Senator N. B. SCOTT,
Washington, D. C., U. S. A.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to communicate to you the very sincere appreciation of E. O. C. Ord Post, No. 100, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Tennessee, for the interest you have taken in the United States national cemetery in this city and for the bill you have introduced asking for an appropriation of $50,000 for the purpose of improving the same. The deplorable condition of the buildings and grounds for some years past has occasioned much severe comment among American citizens who have visited our city, and the fact that the bones of American soldiers who fell in this valley in 1848 rest in this cemetery and should be covered by a stone and surrounded by a wall in keeping with the dignity of our Government has accentuated unfavorable criticism. The post feels now assured that the Congress of the United States will grant the appropriation asked for, and thus improve the spot where lie the remains of so many of our patriotic dead.

Again thanking you in the name of the post,

I have the honor to be, most truly, yours,

J. C. MORDOUGH, Post Commander.

C. M. BUSH, Adjutant.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, the laws of Mexico are such that a cemetery must be obscured from public view. They have raised the streets in the new part of the city of Mexico, and in raising the same the streets are now almost on a level with the walls that surround the cemetery. Those walls will have to be raised or the city authorities of the City of Mexico will compel the United States to take action or vacate. The building that was on the cemetery lot is falling down on account of the dampness of the surroundings. As the letter which has been read states—I saw it myself and took the American ambassador out to it—the cemetery is in a deplorable condition.

Right adjoining it is the cemetery of England, which is beautifully kept. It is a pleasure to visit the British cemetery, while in ours you are afraid you will come in contact with disagreeable objects. I do not believe that this great country wants to neglect the only piece of ground that we own in the City of Mexico, a place where the bones of over 800 soldiers of the Mexican war are buried. At present there is nothing but a little insignificant sandstone monument about 5 feet high to commemorate the deeds of those valiant soldiers, and I am sure that there is not a Senator on the floor of the Senate, or an American citizen, who, if he saw the condition of that cemetery, would not cheerfully vote this sum of money to put it in proper condition.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. Are the remains of the soldiers collected in the cemetery?

Mr. SCOTT. They were brought from the battlefields to the cemetery.

Mr. STONE. Are they in a particular spot or grave?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. STONE. What is the amount of this proposed appropriation?

Mr. SCOTT. The bill proposes to appropriate $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. STONE. Could not those bones or those remains be brought from Mexico to the United States and buried at Arlington, or some other national cemetery for as little money, and would it not be more in keeping with the patriotic sentiments of our people and of our country to do that than to leave them in a foreign land?

Mr. WARREN. I would like to ask the Senator a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I want to ask a question bearing upon the question which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] asked. Is it not a fact that since that time we have buried in this cemetery such Americans as may have died in that country, including consuls and other officers, and is it not a fact that there is a law about bringing remains of deceased persons from interior points in Mexico that makes it very hard and sometimes impossible to get the dead body of an American across the line and out of there, so that it becomes necessary almost and certainly desirable that we should have a burying ground in Mexico?

Mr. STONE. I have no objection to the appropriation being made, Mr. President, if the remains are to stay there, but it would seem to me that the dust of those dead soldiers would be better honored if they rested in their native land.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Missouri that the remains now reposing in the cemetery are those of soldiers gathered from a number of battlefields and brought there at a remote period. I presume that it will be hardly worth discussing the question as to whether it would be possible to find enough of them to bring them to this country. I doubt whether they could be brought here after the lapse of so many years.

I noticed in examining the matter that the larger proportion of the soldiers buried in this cemetery were from the southern parts of our country. I am sure that the Government of the United States is spending money in many directions for a less worthy object than is sought by this bill, namely, an appropriation of $50,000 to care for that cemetery.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I sympathize with the sentiment expressed by the Senator from West Virginia, and I have a personal interest in this matter, because my eldest brother was killed at the battle of Cherubusco, and his remains lie somewhere down there. I think that the monument or inclosure, or whatever is proposed by this bill, will mark a spot and evince a sentiment rather than afford recognition of any particular soldier. It will simply indicate to the traveler that Americans died there in discharging their duty and that the Government of the United States thinks enough of them to recognize their services in this manner.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 4, after the word "be," it is proposed to insert "erected in the United States National Cemetery at Mexico City, Mexico, a suitable monument to the memory of the United States soldiers who fought in the war with Mexico, and to be;" in line 8, after the word "the," to insert "wall around and the;" in the same line, after the word "to," to strike out "the United States National Cemetery at Mexico City, Mexico," and insert "said cemetery;" and in line 11, after the word "be," to strike out "found needed" and to insert "necessary," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to cause to be erected in the United States National Cemetery at Mexico City, Mexico, a suitable monument to the memory of the United States soldiers who fought in the war with Mexico, and to be rebuilt or repaired, as may be necessary, the wall around and the buildings attached to said cemetery, and to make such improvements in the grounds as may be necessary; and to carry out the provisions of this act the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REVISION OF THE PENAL LAWS.

Mr. HEYBURN. I call for the regular order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2982) to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next section passed over will be stated.

The Secretary proceeded to read section 286.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, my notes show that section 269 has been passed over.

Mr. HEYBURN. Section 269 was not passed over.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Very well.

The Secretary read section 286, as follows:

SEC. 286. [Whoever, within the territorial limits of any State, organized Territory, or District, but within or upon any of the places now existing or hereafter reserved or acquired, described in section 269 of this act, shall do or omit the doing of any act or thing which is not made penal by any law of Congress, but which if committed or omitted within the jurisdiction of the State, Territory, or District in which such place is situated, by the laws thereof now in force would be penal, shall be deemed guilty of a like offense and be subject to a like punishment; and every such State, Territorial, or District law shall, for the purposes of this section, continue in force, notwithstanding any subsequent repeal or amendment thereof by any such State, Territory, or District.]

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would not feel justified in passing over section 286 without calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that that section will always occupy a peculiar position among the laws of the country. It is one that should be reenacted with every Congress. In 1832, in the case of The United States v. Paul—

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall stated it to be the opinion of the court that the third section of the act of Congress entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes," passed March 3, 1825, is to be limited to the laws of the several States in force at the time of its enactment. This was ordered to be certified to the circuit court for the southern district of New York.

Ever since that time that has been the settled law with reference to the status of that kind of legislation. Where Congress adopts the legislation of the State as a basis upon which criminal prosecutions may be had, it adopts it as of the status of the State or Territorial laws at the time of the enactment of the act of Congress, and the State or Territory may repeal that law, and it may no longer be a crime under the State or Territory, and yet it remains an offense punishable in the United States courts. The United States courts are administering laws and enforcing criminal statutes that were passed last, I think, in 1886, and in many instances they have been repealed by the States which enacted them. Yet they are still the law to be enforced in the United States courts.

There seems to be no way out of this difficulty. It was held that under the Constitution of the United States we could not adopt the legislation of a State by anticipation, even though that legislation consisted of the repeal of an existing State law. So there seems to be no way out of this difficulty except at reasonably frequent intervals to reenact this statute. Then its force and effect will be as of the date of its last enactment.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN. I desire to ask the Senator from Idaho if he does not think that a law of Congress enacting a law of the State, without examining into the law of the State to see what it is, ought not to be so worded as to continue that law in force after the State shall have repealed it or amended it? If it is wise for Congress to adopt the law of the State, then it seems to me it would be wise for Congress to adopt the amendment of it or the repeal of it.

Mr. HEYBURN. It can not do it.

Mr. McLAURIN. Why can you not strike out the word "now," in line 16, and all after the word "punishment," in line 18, and thus accomplish it?

Mr. HEYBURN. Because the United States Supreme Court says that Congress has not that power under the Constitution. They have undertaken it, and Justice Story drew the act of 1825, I think it was, with the express view of doing that very thing. He differed from his associates, and rendered one of the ablest dissenting opinions that he ever wrote. He contended that he could draw an act which would make effective the legislation to be enacted by the State, just as is suggested by the Senator from Mississippi. But the Supreme Court never agreed with him.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not understand the reading of the decision by the Senator from Idaho to bear that construction. But if it be correct that Congress can not provide that there shall be a repeal of the law of Congress by a repeal of the law of the State, then what necessity is there to put in the section that provision?

Mr. HEYBURN. The last clause?

Mr. McLAURIN. The last clause and the word "now."

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think there is any necessity for the last clause if we had to deal only with lawyers who were advised of the very serious consideration that has been given to this power by the Supreme Court of the United States. But it is not always well to pare the language of legislation down to the bare necessities, especially in legislation of this character, which is so unusual.

Mr. McLAURIN. I think the judges who will pass upon this and the lawyers who will appear before them for the trial of the causes and to invoke this act will be lawyers competent to examine the constitutionality of the question and will probably look up the decision which has been read by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will call the Senator's attention to the fact that the act of 1825 contained that language, and it has been interpreted in a very long line of decisions. Every phase of this question has been before the courts. I have here a memorandum of the cases, decided at frequent intervals since the enactment of the first law by Congress upon this subject, showing that the courts have not been free from difficulty even with this plain statement, in less than ten lines, by Chief Justice Marshall. The original act of the 3d of March, 1825, and as amended in 1886, contained these words:

And no subsequent repeal of any such State law shall affect any prosecution for such offense in any court of the United States.

It was the purpose of the committee presenting this bill to avoid any change in existing law where it could be avoided, because we desired to have as little occasion for considering the effect of a change, as to whether it constituted new legislation or not, as was possible. Our duty was to present to this body and to the other the law as it exists, in a revised, codified form, revised by bringing together statutes for the purpose of remolding them in the interest of harmony of expression, cutting out redundant matter and expressions, but in no instance to change the practice of the law. That was the purpose and that was the endeavor of the committee.

Now, it may be that those words could be dispensed with, but inasmuch as they have run all through the consideration of this law in the many decisions of the courts down to a very recent date, we thought it wise not to disturb that language. I think it is wise.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I think it is otherwise. It seems to me it will produce a great deal of confusion to enact into the laws of the United States a provision that the present laws of all the States, wherever they affect the criminal jurisprudence in territory under the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be irrepealably the law of Congress. A State that has enacted a law for its guidance and for the punishment of crime has the same law made by Congress for every part of the territory in that State which is subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. It would be almost impossible for the Congress to look into the laws of all the States and see when they are repealed and when they are not repealed and see whether it is advisable to repeal these laws or not and to make different laws in their stead.

You make an act a crime in the State of Idaho by an act of Congress because it is a crime by the laws of the State of Idaho, and the wisdom of the legislature of Idaho has been exercised in determining whether a man shall be punished for the particular offense in that State. After a while the State of Idaho comes to the conclusion that that was an unwise law and ought not to have been upon the statute books; that the act ought not to have been made a criminal act by the laws of the State; that it ought not to have been made punishable by the courts of the State. But you have a law on the statute books of the United States which says that while the legislature may repeal that law in Idaho and in all the parts of the State except where the United States courts have jurisdiction of a criminal offense, and provide that it shall not be a criminal offense, yet in that particular jurisdiction it is criminal. I do not think that is wise legislation. I think it is very well to enact a law that that which is criminal in the other portions of the State shall be criminal in that portion of the State which is subject to the laws of Congress. But being predicated upon the idea that the legislature, in its wisdom, has sought to ascertain the proper law for the punishment of crimes that militate against the peace and dignity of the State, it seems to me, when the wisdom of the legislature shall have reversed itself and come to the conclusion that there is no longer any necessity for the law or that it was unwisely enacted, the repeal of that law by the legislature ought to repeal the law by Congress which was predicated upon the law of the State.

That is my idea about it, and this, I think, can be accomplished by striking out the word "now" in line 16, and all after the word "punishment" in line 18.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but I desire to make some suggestions for his consideration in connection with what he is saying.

I entirely agree with what the Senator says as a practical proposition; but the difficulty is that we can not, at any rate in my judgment we can not, do what the Senator suggested we should do. In the first place, we have only power to adopt the laws which are now in force in the State. We have no power to adopt a law which any State may hereafter adopt, because to do that would be to delegate to the legislature of a State the power of Congress to enact laws, and that is something we can not do.

Now, the repeal of an existing law is legislation, and if Congress were to say, "We will adopt the law of a State now in existence until it has been repealed and then adopt the repeal of the State," it would be to delegate to the State the power to make a law, namely, to repeal an existing law. We have no constitutional power to do that.

The Senator then said we ought to drop from the section the provision that those repealed laws shall remain in force notwithstanding their repeal. That is necessary because, as the Senator knows, very often the repeal of the penal laws of a State consists of the revision of all the laws of the State and the consequent repeal by the revision of the whole existing body of the law of the State. That occurs at very frequent intervals. In my own State, which is a comparatively small State, about every ten years we have had a complete revision of the penal laws, and when the laws are revised there is a clause repealing all the existing laws. If we drop out of the pending section this language to which the Senator refers, the result would be that very often, by omitting that from the section of the law, we would be without any penal law at all in many of the States. It is better that we should for a while be enforcing laws which perhaps the States thought ought to be repealed than to have no law at all.

I venture to say it is a very rare occurrence for a State absolutely to repeal a law. Repeals are usually done by amendment, by adding something to the law, by revision, or something of that sort. But the substantive provision of the law is very rarely repealed. They repeal by revision, repeal by adding something, and because of that character of repeal I do not feel that a very great hardship is going to result. But I can foresee that very great injustice might result if we have not that sort of a provision in the law.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is such an excellent lawyer and is so clear on every question which he touches that I dislike to differ with him on a constitutional proposition. But I do differ with him on this. I think Congress has it within its power to say that a certain law shall last a certain length of time, and I think Congress has the power to make that length of time dependent upon a certain condition. That is my idea of the constitutional question involved in it.

If the Senator agrees with me on the policy, then if the penalty is abrogated because of the repeal of the penalty by the State law that executes the very policy which I advocate. So he would accomplish that which he believes to be the best policy by striking out these provisions. But if the legislature has it in its power to repeal the penal provision and that dispossesses the courts of the United States of any power to inflict a penalty, it is, if the Senator is correct on the constitutional proposition, within the power of the legislature to do indirectly what it can not do directly; and that we know is a proposition which has been condemned by all the courts.

If it be true that the leaving out of these provisions would not affect that policy which I advocate and which the Senator approves, what is the necessity for putting in these provisions? Without these provisions the law would be the same if we can not constitutionally provide for the repeal of the law at the time when the legislature of the State shall repeal the State law, or amend it or modify it. There is no necessity for putting in the word "now" if we can only adopt the laws which are now enforced by the States, because the courts would construe this in a reasonable way and would construe that we were using language here to effectuate that which we could constitutionally do. Hence there is no necessity for the word "now."

Then, again, if it be true that the repeal of the law by the State can not by virtue of the Constitution of the United States accomplish the repeal of the law which we here enact, there is no necessity for a word of that section after the word "punishment."

I submit these suggestions, and I now offer an amendment to strike out the word "now," in line 16, and all after the word "punishment," in line 18.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi proposes an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 149, line 16, after the word "thereof," strike out "now;" and after the word "punishment," in line 18, strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Idaho if there are any decisions distinctly upon the point which has been discussed by the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Utah, as to whether or not a statute of the United States can limit the law to the time when it shall be in force. I quite understand and see the force of the suggestion that it would be impossible to enact a law which would put in force a State statute thereafter to be enacted by the State. There can be no question whatever about that. But, as the Senator has said that the matter has been frequently before the courts, I should like to know whether the precise question has been decided by the courts or whether the Senator is representing that the committee in this particular are concluding that from an analysis of the various decisions.

Mr. HEYBURN. The question has been squarely and fairly decided on more than one occasion. I was very much inclined to bring into the Senate Chamber to-day the authorities bearing upon this question, but it is so large a question, one which has so frequently and so extensively occupied the time of the courts, that I felt loath to impose upon the Senate a legal discussion of this question that has been summed up so tersely and so completely by an authority that is absolutely conclusive upon the subject.

The question of the delegation of power by Congress to a State legislature to repeal a law is exactly the same as the delegation of the power by Congress to a State legislature to enact one, because the process of repealing is the process of enacting a law. That has been made so plain by the decisions of the courts that I think it will not be seriously controverted now upon consideration.

There is no section of the law with which I have come in contact in more than thirty years' active practice against which

I have rebelled so often as this section. I reserved the right in the joint committee of the two Houses to object to it on the floor of the Senate should I desire to do so, as I stated on a former occasion, when this section was reached for consideration. It is repugnant to my sense as a lawyer of the methods which should pertain in the enactment of laws. I said in committee that I believed it was our duty to gather up and enumerate the various offenses that might be legislated upon as crimes by a State legislature. It is a formidable task. In all the States they have many phases of crime, and every one of them is apt to present itself to a United States court because the United States courts are all-comprehensive from a territorial standpoint.

The necessity for conferring jurisdiction upon United States courts to punish according to the law of the State arises out of a very peculiar condition. A post-office on one side of a street the jurisdiction of which has been ceded to the United States by the State, as provided by the Constitution of the United States, and a building upon the other side of the street belonging to private individuals and under the jurisdiction of the laws of the State would seem to present the question in the plainest manner for consideration. A man commits exactly the same offense in the post-office as another person commits on the opposite side of the street. The man who commits the offense in the post-office is triable in the United States courts under the laws of the United States. He can not be tried under the laws of the State, because the State has ceded to the United States jurisdiction, as it must under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. He is tried by the United States court according to the rules that pertain in that tribunal, and the man who commits exactly the same offense upon the opposite side of the street is tried under the laws of the State.

Now, the law under which the United States court is administering justice on one side of the street is the law that was in force at the time of the passage of the act similar to the one under consideration, which was in 1886, the last time this was enacted. The man on the opposite side of the street is tried under a law which was enacted by the State legislature perhaps last year, entirely different in its terms, different as to the method of punishment, different as to the method of trial.

Mr. McLAURIN. Will the Senator from Idaho allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN. Would not that be the same if the State had repealed the law and the United States court were trying the defendant under a law that the State had at one time enacted but had repealed and put another law in its place?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the same question presented in a different form. The change of the provisions in a law might constitute a partial repeal of the law which existed at the time when the United States adopted the laws of the State.

Mr. McLAURIN. But my question to the Senator is, Would it not then be, under the provisions of this law, that the State court would be trying him under one law right across the street, while the Federal court would be trying another man under a different law right on the other side of the street, and both of them had grown out of State law?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is absolutely true. And it is upon that that I have so long contended that there should be some other method than that proposed by this statute. But what is the other method? It is that we diligently gather up and enumerate and prescribe for the punishment of each of the different offenses that might be committed in every portion of this country. It would constitute rather an extensive criminal code in itself, because, as I say, there are crimes which are peculiar to certain localities and certain conditions which do not pertain in others.

Congress from the very beginning realized the necessity of ingrafting upon the laws of the United States the statutes of the State in regard to criminal offenses and of enforcing those laws in the United States courts, and they thought at the beginning that the repeal of the law by the State legislature might be carried into the consideration of the United States courts, until Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Paul v. United States, held that it could not be done. That, as I have already said, inspired Justice Story to the effort that resulted in the act of 1825, which he himself drew, and he recites his experience with this question. He thought he could overcome the constitutional difficulty of making the action of a State legislature in repealing a law operative upon the United States courts in administering a law, and he finally gave it up, and the courts of last resort have held uniformly that it could not be done; that for Congress to say that they would adopt and enforce a State law for but a given period, or rather until the State legislature repealed it or modified it or changed it, was to delegate to the State the power to repeal an act of Congress or to modify or to change it, and that is the law as it stands to-day.

So, as the Constitution stands to-day, if we want to adopt the laws of the State for the convenient and effective administration of justice in the punishment of crimes, we must simply reenact this provision as often as it seems necessary and wise to do. It could be done pro forma, say once in every two or four years, as might be deemed best. But it seems to be the only refuge, and the committee, after considering the matter for days, and recurring again and again to this provision of law, could find no remedy other than that which is presented.

To strike out the word "now," as suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, so as to leave it indefinite, would be to change existing law. The word "now" is in the law as it has been in force since 1825. The word "now" was in the law as it was interpreted by Chief Justice Marshall and as it has been repeatedly interpreted by the Supreme Court since that time. So I can see no reason now for striking out that word.

To strike out all after the word "punishment" comes within the same consideration, because the existing law as it was enacted in the very beginning of the jurisprudence of this country contained the same provision that the committee have reported in this bill. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Idaho will pardon me, but I suppose in the heat of his argument he has overlooked the exact inquiry I made of him, which was whether the precise point has been decided, or whether the Senator concluded from the decisions which have been made that it necessarily involved that point. I wish to know whether the precise point was ever presented to the court and decided by the court—that it is unconstitutional for Congress to enact a law under which the statute of the State would be adopted and would be continued in force only so long as it remained in force in the State. Has that precise point ever been decided?

Mr. HEYBURN. That has been decided.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will give us the decision. I am not asking it for the purpose of controversy, but for the purpose of satisfying myself.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that. That precise point has been considered and decided time and again. I have not in the Senate Chamber the authorities on the subject, but there are many full considerations of that question in the decisions which the Senator will find brought together probably in Rose's Notes of Concurrent Cases under the case of The United States v. Paul, and not only that, but in Mr. Story's treatise on the Constitution I think he will find a very thorough and elaborate consideration of the question.

Mr. McLAURIN. If the Senator will allow me, the case of The United States v. Paul does not decide that question at all. The case of The United States v. Paul merely decides that the act of Congress of March 3, 1825, did not punish a man in New York under an act passed by the legislature of New York after 1825. That is all that is decided by the case of Paul. There is no constitutional question discussed in that case.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not intend to be understood as saying that there was. I used it as a reference for the purpose of reviewing the Concurrent Cases. I say that if the Senator will review the Concurrent Cases that are brought together by the commentator under that head he will probably find all these cases there. There is a long line of cases in which the question is considered in its every elaboration.

Mr. McLAURIN. But the Senator will observe that there is no reference at all in the case of The United States v. Paul to the Constitution of the United States or to any other constitution.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I know that.

Mr. McLAURIN. It was only a question whether, under the act of Congress of March 3, 1825, the act of the New York legislature enacted thereafter——

Mr. HEYBURN. Changed the law as it was at the time of the passage of the act.

Mr. McLAURIN. No; whether the act of Congress of 1825, making an offense, was carried into the act of the legislature of New York.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; it is the announcement of a principle by the Chief Justice that I read with reference to the case of The United States v. Paul; but I stated to the Senator what, according to all the authorities, the law is, and of course I did not deem it necessary to bring them all in here, because that would be too much like arguing a case before a court. I assume that if there is doubt in the mind of Senators they will investigate the question in the usual way.

Mr. McLAURIN. If the Senator will pardon me again for interrupting him——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN. I suggest that there is no announcement of any principle in the case of The United States v. Paul. It is merely the interpretation of a statute.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, that is the announcement of a principle.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not think there is any principle announced.

Mr. HEYBURN. The principle involved is whether or not it fixed the time when the statute of the State attaches in the United States courts. That is quite a material consideration.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not think it is that. I think it only fixed the time when that particular act attached. One act might attach and another might not attach.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the only act we have, and that is the act we are considering to-day in the revision. That is the act the committee has reported to the Senate. It is the act of 1825, and it is the act under consideration.

Mr. McLAURIN. That is true enough, and it is the act that I think ought to be amended.

Mr. HEYBURN. The act of 1825?

Mr. McLAURIN. I think so. We are amending laws as far back as 1825 on this very bill, and adding new laws.

Mr. HEYBURN. I appeal to the Senator that that would probably be a rather dangerous position to establish here. There are quite a number of laws on the statute books of the United States that probably both the Senator and myself would agree should be amended, but we would also agree that it was not the proper function for a committee on revision or codification of the laws to undertake to amend them, because if it is proposed to amend them the amendment should be introduced in the ordinary way of legislation in this body and go to the appropriate standing committee for consideration.

Mr. McLAURIN. I will ask the Senator if we are not amending them all along, and amending them at the suggestion of the committee?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, there is no amendment in these laws that has been adopted with my concurrence. We have here, in the interest of getting the bill through, which is quite a serious consideration, conceded certain amendments, not always in accordance with our judgment as to what should be done; but it is better sometimes to concede an amendment that is not of very grave importance than it is to defeat a purpose such as we have in view, that of codifying the laws. If we undertook here to criticise the wisdom of the legislators who adopted them we probably never would codify them, because we would have to reenact all the legislation of the last forty or fifty years.

So, while we might both agree that these laws could be framed in more apt language, or that certain provisions could be wisely omitted from them, yet I appeal to the Senators that it would not be wise or tend to the ultimate accomplishment of our purpose to engage in that beyond the absolute and pressing necessities. I should like to avoid the necessity of enacting section 286, and I would have been willing in the committee to undertake the vast work of looking up from the code of every State in the Union the crimes, enumerating them, specifying them, determining the manner of their punishment. But I was forced to concede that it had never been considered practicable or necessary, when away back in the beginning such great jurists as we had then forming the laws of this country laid the foundation for that great system of jurisprudence which has worked so well, and I yielded my views on the subject. I thought as the Senator did. The instincts of a lawyer rebel against adopting the laws of a State without enacting what they were and allowing the State to repeal them without the benefit of action in the courts. I think it better to let the law stand as it is and as it has stood for so long than to change it, even though our judgment appeals to us against the wisdom of the original enactment.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I do not wish to discuss this question any further, but as the decision of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of the United States v. Paul contains only about eight lines I will read the whole decision, so that the entire decision will go into the RECORD.

Mr. HEYBURN. I read every word of it.

Mr. McLAURIN. This is the entire opinion of the court:

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall stated it to be the opinion of the court, that the third section of the act of Congress entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes," passed March 3, 1825, is to be limited to the laws of the several States in force at the time of its enactment. This was ordered to be certified to the circuit court for the southern district of New York.

This is found on page 142 of 6 Peters's Reports.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I hope the amendment suggested by the Senator from Mississippi will not be adopted. I think the effect of it would be to declare that prosecutions might be had under the laws of the State passed hereafter, and I do not think that that legislation would be constitutional.

Mr. McLAURIN. I did not hear the Senator. I was not noticing what he said.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I say I think the effect of adopting the amendment which the Senator has suggested would be to declare that prosecutions might be had under the laws of a State passed after we have passed this act of Congress, and I think we have no power to enact that sort of legislation.

Mr. McLAURIN. Then does not the Senator think that the court, following a well-known rule of law, would construe it as being the intention of Congress to go only as far as Congress has the constitutional power to go?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; that might be so, under ordinary circumstances, but the court also takes into consideration sometimes the debates in Congress. When the construction of a law is in doubt, very often resort is had to the debates in Congress. If it should appear that the word "now" was originally in the law and had been stricken out, evidently it was intended to give the law a different interpretation from that which it would have with the word "now" in it. With the word "now" in the law it is plain and unambiguous. It means to confine the adoption of these laws to those which are now in force, and does not attempt to apply the rule to laws which may be hereafter enacted.

The Senator also proposes to strike out the language of the section that the laws of the State shall "continue in force, notwithstanding any subsequent repeal or amendment thereof by any such State, Territory, or District." I have already said that in my judgment that would be in effect to authorize the State to enact a law. It is precisely the same in effect as though instead of adopting this simple section we say that we adopt all the penal laws of the various States. It is in effect the same as if we had read all of those laws into the statutes of the United States; as though we had taken section after section from the various penal codes of the States and enacted them in precise words in the statute. If we had done that, if we had said in one section that such and such an act should be punishable when committed in a certain State, that such and such an act should be punishable when committed in another State, and so on through the whole list of laws and through the whole list of forty-six States and spread them upon the statue books in that way, then I think there could be no doubt that if we would permit a provision in addition to that in the law, that those laws should cease to have operation whenever any particular State had repealed that law, it would be unconstitutional, because it would be an enactment of the law.

Mr. McLAURIN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN. I agree with the Senator fully that Congress can not empower a State legislature to make a law hereafter and have that law to become a law of the United States. There is no question about that, because Congress can not delegate to the legislature of a State or to any other auhority the power to enact law. We are agreed upon that. But does not the Senator hold that Congress has the power to enact a law and limit the time during which it shall have its existence?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think we have the right to enact a law and say that it shall be in force and operation until a particular date.

Mr. McLAURIN. Does not the Senator hold that Congress can make the limitation of that law depend upon a contingency?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The action of the legislature of a State?

Mr. McLAURIN. That was not the question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is the case.

Mr. McLAURIN. I asked the Senator if he does not hold that Congress can make the limitation of the law depend upon a future contingency?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will answer that by saying sometimes we can and sometimes we can not. It depends upon what the contingency is. If the Senator means that Congress may enact a law and say the law shall be in force and operation until the legislature of some particular State sees fit to declare otherwise, I say no. I think we have no such power. If he means that we may enact a law to be in operation until a certain date comes, then I say yes, we may do that.

Mr. McLAURIN. The State legislatures have enacted laws, and they have made them take effect in certain localities, in certain counties, or certain municipalities, upon the happening of a contingency, and that contingency is the vote of the county or locality upon a certain proposition, and it depends upon the result of that vote. For instance, the States have enacted laws upon the question of local option which will take effect in a certain county or in any county upon the county's voting a certain way. The legislature of that State can not possibly delegate to the voters of the county the power to make the law. The voters do not make the law, the law is made by the legislature; but the contingency of its taking effect in that particular community or locality is provided. That contingency may be the action of a board of supervisors or the action of the voters of the county.

This is analogous to that case. The Congress of the United States enacts this law, and the law has for its force and effect the action of Congress enacting it. It passes this body; it passes the House of Representatives and is signed by the President of the United States, and that gives it its effect as a law. The contingency upon which that shall be limited may be the action of anybody. It may be the action of the voters of a State, or of the executive of a State, or of the judiciary of the State, or of the legislature of the State. That is frequently done. The act depends upon its being effective upon the action of the Executive of the United States. The President of the United States can not make the law any more than the legislature of a State can make the law. So I hold that it is within the power of Congress to enact the law and fix a time for its limitation. That limitation may be certain or it may be contingent. The contingency may be the action of anybody that the Congress of the United States shall designate, and if it designates the legislature of a State, the contingency depends upon the action of the legislature of the State. That is my idea about it. That is my opinion about the law. I so hold.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I recognize the force of what the Senator from Mississippi says on this subject, but it seems to me that the case which we have here is very different from the case which he illustrates; that is, the case of local-option laws. This case would be analogous to a case happening in a State where the State legislature had passed a law intended to be of uniform operation within the State, and had then declared that that law should cease to have operation entirely whenever a certain body of men in the State, the judiciary or some of the executive officers, might so declare. In other words, it would be to delegate to that select body of men, or, if you please, to the entire people of the State, the power to make a law, or to unmake a law, which it appears to me is the same thing.

If we adopt the amendment suggested by the Senator from Missouri, it seems to me that is what we are doing. We have, in the first place, enacted a set of laws in precisely the same way as if we had spread them at length upon the statute books, and then after having done that we say these laws shall cease to have operation so far as this Government is concerned whenever the legislature of the particular State to which they are adapted shall repeal them. It seems to me that to do that would be to delegate to the State legislatures the power to make a law for us.

Mr. McLAURIN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN. When a State legislature enacts a law that upon the vote of a county in favor of prohibition there shall be no more licensed saloons in that county, does the State law depend upon the action of that particular locality?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is, as to whether or not it shall ever go into operation at all? Yes.

Mr. McLAURIN. Then is not the State delegating authority to that county to make a law?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No, I do not think so.

Mr. McLAURIN. I think not either; and I do not think that the existence of the lawmaking power depends upon the action of the voters of the county.

Now, I want to ask the Senator from Utah another question. The Senator recognizes that the courts of the States have held that such laws are constitutional?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes, that has been held in many cases, I do not know whether uniformly or not.

Mr. McLAURIN. I know of no case to the contrary.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not recall any.

Mr. McLAURIN. Now then, suppose that county is what we call "dry" for two years and votes on that proposition again and votes "wet." Then after that date saloons are licensed in that county. Does the Senator hold that the people of that county have enacted a different law?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My understanding about it is that when the legislature of a State have passed a law of that kind they have simply said whenever the people of any particular locality in the State shall determine prohibition it shall be in effect. The law is not enacted; it is not made a rule applicable to that territory until the people of the locality have voted upon it.

But the case that I suppose is where the legislature of the State has enacted a law applicable to every part of the State, and then has added to it a provision: "This law shall be no longer in force whenever a majority of the people of the State shall vote," or "whenever certain executive officers of the State may so determine." In that case I think it would be an unlawful delegation of legislative authority, and in the other case I do not think it would be.

I recognize that the line between the cases, where the courts have held there is an unlawful delegation of authority and where they have held that it is not, is a somewhat shadowy one, but it seems to me that this case falls well within the line of an unlawful delegation of power, and the case which the Senator supposes falls without it.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, this has been a very learned and a very interesting discussion, and at last it comes back to what I think will determine it, whether or not there has been a decision by the Supreme Court upon the precise point. If there has, that settles it. If there has not, it is a close question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I can answer for myself that I do not know of the decision. I have not discovered any decision of that character. There may or there may not be.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN].

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the next section passed over.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 319. [Whoever shall willfully and maliciously trespass upon or enter upon any railroad train, railroad car, or railroad locomotive, with the intent to commit murder, robbery, or any unlawful violence upon or against any passenger on said train or car, or upon or against any engineer, conductor, fireman, brakeman, or any officer or employee connected with said locomotive, train, or car, or upon or against any express messenger or mail agent on said train or in any such car thereof, or to commit any crime or offense against any person or property thereon, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than twenty years, or both. Whoever shall counsel, aid, abet or assist in the perpetration of any of the offenses set forth in this section shall be deemed to be a principal therein. Upon the trial of any person charged with any offense set forth in this section it shall not be necessary to set forth or prove the particular person against whom it was intended to commit the offense, or that it was intended to commit such offense against any particular person.]

Mr. McLAURIN. I have an amendment to offer to this section, and I believe the Senator from Idaho and also the Senator from Utah agree with me that the amendment ought to be adopted. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], who has been unavoidably called out of the Chamber, intended to make some observations in support of the amendment. I ask that the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

The SECRETARY. Strike out in the section, beginning with the word "robbery," in line 22, the following words:

Robbery, or any unlawful violence upon or against any passenger on said train or car, or upon or against any engineer, conductor, fireman, brakeman, or any officer or employee connected with said locomotive, train, or car, or upon or against any express messenger or mail agent on said train or in any such car thereof, or to commit any crime or offense against any person or property thereon.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

Or other felony, and shall commit any overt act in an attempt to commit such murder, robbery, or other felony.

Also strike out all after the word "therein," in line 8, in the following words:

Upon the trial of any person charged with any offense set forth in this section it shall not be necessary to set forth or prove the particular person against whom it was intended to commit the offense, or that it was intended to commit such offense against any particular person.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I did not mean to strike out the word "robbery." I meant to strike out after the word "robbery," in line 22, on page 163, down to the word "shall," in line 4, on page 164.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "robbery," at the end of line 22, on page 163, it is proposed to strike out down to and including the word "thereon," in line 4, on page 164, and to insert in lieu thereof the words, "or other felony, and shall commit any overt act in an attempt to commit such murder, robbery, or other felony;" and after the word "therein," on page 164, line 8, it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, if there is to be any objection to this amendment, which I thought was to be accepted, I wish to say a word or two in reference to it.

This section seems to have been directed by an act of Congress passed in 1902 against a certain organization known as the "Labor Union Organization," and to punish them for offenses. I am willing to have them punished for offenses which they commit, but for any offense that is mentioned between the word "robbery," in line 22, on page 163, and the word "shall," in line 4, on page 164, I am not willing that such an enormous penalty shall be imposed upon the offender. Now, let us see how it reads:

Or any unlawful violence upon or against any passenger on said train or car, or upon or against any engineer, conductor, fireman, brakeman, or any officer or employee connected with said locomotive, train, or car, or upon or against any express messenger or mail agent on said train or in any such car thereof, or to commit any crime or offense against any person or property thereon, etc.

The proposition is that any person who goes upon a train with the intent to commit any of these small offenses is to be punished by a fine of $5,000.

Mr. BACON. "Not more than $5,000."

Mr. McLAURIN. But it may be that much—not exceeding $5,000 fine or twenty years' imprisonment. A man may go on one of these trains with the intent to break a 10-cent walking cane, and if he is convicted of that intent, although he may never have committed any overt act in the effort to put that intent into execution, he is to be fined $5,000 and suffer twenty years' imprisonment if the judge sees proper to inflict such a punishment. It is no answer to say that it is within the discretion of the court and the court may not impose such a harsh penalty on a man. The court ought not to have the power or the discretion to impose such a harsh penalty for such a small offense—a mere intent.

I am not willing to put upon the statute book a law which is evidently directed at this class of men, when men of great wealth commit great crimes that go entirely "unwhipp'd of justice."

I think that the man who goes upon a train with the intention to commit murder or robbery or other felony—I do not care whether he belongs to a labor union or whether he is a nonunion man; I do not care whether he is a laborer or what may be his calling—ought to be punished; but as to the man who goes there with the intention of committing a little offense, like breaking a walking cane or the laying of his hand in violence upon another, even though he may not intend to do him any physical injury—to put it in the power of a judge to punish that man by a $5,000 fine or twenty years' imprisonment is, to my mind, monstrous, and such a law ought not to be permitted to go through any legislative body in this country. No such law as that ought to be found even in the decrees and the laws of Russia, if they have any laws at all. Even the most autocratic government ought not to pass such a law as that.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have not had time to recur to the debate which occurred the other day, but I think the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN], who has just addressed the Senate on this subject, participated in the enactment of the present law, which contains this proposition.

Mr. McLAURIN. I will say to the Senator that I never voted for such a law. I was in the Senate at the time, but I was then in the minority in this Chamber, as I am now, and I am not responsible for that law. So the Senator can not say I did it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not think this is a question of majority or minority. This law, whether intended or not, would prevent—I dislike to mention names—but I will say it would prevent the president of the Standard Oil Company from entering upon a railroad train and using his cane upon the president of the New York Central Railroad Company, and it is quite important that the president of the New York Central Railroad should be protected from such violence if it were intended. Of course the law is in general terms. While the Senator from Mississippi has suggested that it was directed against certain labor organizations, the labor organizations must take their chance with other people in being prohibited from the commission of crime. I have submitted the inquiry to the heads of the organization to which the Senator refers as to whether or not they desired the privilege of committing the offenses prohibited by existing law; but I have not yet received the answer, which I presume I shall receive ultimately, as to whether or not they desire the privilege of entering upon trains and committing these acts. Let me enumerate them and see:

Murder, robbery——

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; if the Senator from Mississippi desires me to do so; but I am merely reading the bill.

Mr. McLAURIN. But murder and robbery are not included within my amendment. They are not the words which I propose to strike out.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am aware of that, and I intended so to express myself. I was reading the existing law on the subject which was enacted with the concurrence of the Senators present. I will proceed to review this section.

The words "murder" and "robbery" are omitted from the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi, but let us consider this. I do not intend to spend very much time over it. I do not believe that we should destroy the effect of a law which prevents crime, I do not care what the penalty may be. I do not believe that any man can take exception to the severity of a penalty against crime, I do not care if it is made a hundred years and an unlimited fine. The man who says that he objects to the penalty against the right to commit a crime—which I concede to no man—even with the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi he wants the right—I do not mean the Senator from Mississippi does, but the party who objects to this statute—to commit "unlawful violence upon or against any passenger on said train or car." Should any man have that right or privilege? Does it matter how severe the penalty? Has any man or organization of men dared stand up here and say, "We claim the right, under any circumstances, to commit that crime?" Should he have the right to commit any unlawful violence—

Upon or against any engineer, conductor, fireman, brakeman, or any officer or employee connected with said locomotive, train, or car?

Should any man be given a right to commit unlawful violence? That is not breaking a man's cane. That simile is not broad enough to cover the description of the offense in this statute. Should any man be given that right? It would controvert the very purposes of government to concede it to him under any circumstances, because the element of self-defense, or protection to self, of the person or his personal rights, does not enter into such an offense. Should he have the right to commit unlawful violence "upon or against any express messenger or mail agent," who is the representative of the Government of the United States, on any train or in any car, or to commit any crime or offense against any person or property upon any train? What difference how severe you make the penalty? Can you not trust the judge to temper the measure of justice to such men better than you can trust the man who wants to commit that offense? I think so. I grow suspicious of the men, or of any organization of men, that come to me to protest against a law that prevents them from committing unlawful violence because the penalty is too great or for any other reason, because such a protest carries with it the tacit demand of the right to commit the crime; and by such a protest they say, not by implication, but as plain as motives can be expressed, "we want the law so mild in its terms, or so ambiguous in its form, that we may commit these acts of violence and these unlawful acts against these persons provided we are willing to pay a very light fine or to endure a very light punishment."

I have no patience with such a protest against law and order. I have no patience with the protest in favor of an open door to the commission of crime, and I draw no class lines or no lines between wealth and poverty. I am willing to face that issue anywhere, in the fields of labor or the fields of enterprise or the fields of responsibility, wherever the question is raised. I have not very much patience with the protest that says, "only make the punishment light enough so that I can infract or break this law, or provided that I am willing that my handy man, put forward for the purpose of doing it, shall not be punished too severely."

Mr. President, to adopt the amendment suggested by the Senator from Mississippi is to repeal a law that was passed only three Congresses ago, a law that has been passed in the wisdom of Congress because it was necessary. I am opposed to repealing that law upon a report made from a joint committee of the two Houses, or I am opposed to seeing it come to a vote unless it comes to this body in the ordinary course of legislation.

I appeal to the Senator from Mississippi, whatever his views may be upon this question, that this being existing law of recent enactment it should stand until some one assumes the responsibility of introducing a bill for its repeal and some standing committee of this body reports in favor of such repeal. Then let it come up for debate in the ordinary process of legislation and we can meet it. But I hope this occasion will not be claimed for the repeal of an existing law so beneficial and necessary. If the penalty is too great, make the penalty less; but you can trust the courts. I recall no instance where the courts have been cruel or unjust or have administered excessive punishment.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I have objected, and do object, to the severity of this penalty for a very slight misdemeanor, and making that a misdemeanor which has never been, so far as I have been able to find, made a misdemeanor by any other statute. I do not do it because I want the privilege of violating the law—I do not desire to violate the law—nor do I do it because I want the privilege granted to anybody else to violate the law or to commit any violence against another man or another man's property.

The Senator says he has written to the head of the organization to know whether they want——

Mr. HEYBURN. No, Mr. President, I did not say that I had written. I had a personal interview——

Mr. McLAURIN. Ah!

Mr. HEYBURN. I had a personal interview within the walls of this Capitol with a man who professed to be speaking for the organization.

Mr. McLAURIN. I understood the Senator to say that he had not heard of any report from anybody that they wanted to do this, and expected to hear a report that they did not.

Mr. HEYBURN. I said I had not received a reply, though I waited a long time, and I have not received it yet.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not suppose the Senator ever will hear anyone say that he wants permission for anybody to commit crime. I think that is a reflection upon the head of the organization and upon the organization itself to ask if they want granted to them the privilege to violate the law, to do wrong to anybody or anybody's property.

It is not a proposition as to whether the lawmaking power desires to encourage people to commit crime or to grant the privilege to commit crime, but it is the enormity of the penalty for a very little offense to which I object. The Senator says that he does not object to this feature of it; that the smallest offense that can be committed, so far as he is concerned, may be visited with imprisonment for life. I suppose the Czar of Russia would say the same thing, that the smallest offense that could be committed in his country might be visited with the gibbet. I feel that there ought to be some discrimination in the penalties that are imposed upon different crimes. The Senator must have thought so, too, for the bill provides as it has gone along one penalty for one crime and another penalty for another crime, and the Senator has during the progress of this debate advocated for certain offenses a reduction of the penalty, because he thought that the one provided was too great. But here, when there is a statute directed against men who probably will permit their passions to be excited and aroused to an extent that is not permissible under good government, the severest penalty is to be put upon a man for the very smallest offense or for intending to commit such an offense.

I suppose that if some humble man were to go upon a railroad car with the intention to break the cane of the president of the New York Central Railroad, to whom the Senator has referred, but were to abandon that intention afterwards, so great has the president of the New York Central Railroad Company become that the Senator would be willing to see the highest penalty imposed upon such a man, because he had the intention of violating the rights of an individual. The man did not execute the intention; he did not have any intention of taking the life or maiming the limb or the person of the president of the New York Central Railroad Company; but if he had the intention of going upon the car for the purpose of slapping his jaw or of breaking his walking cane, then, according to his idea about it, the Senator would see him imprisoned in the penitentiary for life.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I trust the Senator will yield to me for a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. McLAURIN. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator did not understand me to make a statement of that kind—that I would not discriminate at all in the enactment of penalties as between different crimes. I do not think the Senator understood me to say that. I spoke of my individual sentiment in regard to crimes, that it made no difference whether the penalty were large or small. I, of course, recognize, as every intelligent man recognizes, that in enacting legislation you do discriminate between offenses in prescribing the penalty. We have done it always, and have done it very properly. But because I expressed my personal indifference to the size of the fine, it does not follow that I would in fixing penalties disregard the ordinary rules of legislation in discriminating between the grade of offenses, and I think the Senator did not so understand me.

Mr. McLAURIN. I did so understand the Senator. I suppose the Senator meant to say that he himself intends to be so strictly a law-abiding man that it would make no difference to him. I take it that that is true, because I am sure the Senator would not willfully violate any law or any of the rights of anybody else; but we must remember that we are making laws for men who are liable to err—and we are all, so far as that is concerned, liable to err—but if a man does err, he ought not to have attached to him this enormous penalty. Under this section, as you can see, if a man enters a car with intent to commit any crime or offense against any person or property thereon—it does not make any difference what offense; it does not make any difference how small the offense may be; it may be the least offense imaginable, or the intention to commit the least conceivable offense—he might have visited upon him this enormous penalty of $5,000 fine and imprisonment for twenty years. It is true that that is the limit, but the judge may impose the limit upon him. Such a discretion as that ought not to be confided to any judge. The Senator says the judge will exercise his discretion and that he may be trusted to exercise his discretion. Within certain limits and certain bounds that is true; but when it comes to allowing him a discretion of imposing a fine of $5,000 and twenty years' imprisonment upon a man for the least conceivable offense, or for the intent to commit the least conceivable offense, that is to me absolutely monstrous; it is horrible.

Upon trial it is not necessary to give the person indicted the nature and cause of the accusation against him; it is not necessary that the indictment shall set forth or the evidence prove that he intended to commit a serious offense or that he intended to commit an offense against any particular person, but any kind of a paper to show that he intended to commit some offense mentioned in section 319 is sufficient to try him upon. It is a kind of omnium gatherum. The evidence can be thrown into the basket and the man tried upon it.

Such a thing as this ought not to be allowed to go upon the statute books. The fact that it was enacted in 1902 does not make it any better than if it had been enacted in 1802 or 1702. It were better had it been enacted in the ages of the Inquisition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN.].

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr President, before I take my seat I wish to say that I shall insist that this amendment shall be adopted. Another thing, if there is any desire to modify the penalty, I will join in the enactment of any legislation that will impose a penalty upon the intent and upon an overt act or demonstration in the effort to put that intent into effect.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I want to ask the Senator from Mississippi one question, with his permission. Does the Senator think that a person who willfully and maliciously trespasses upon or enters upon a railroad train with the intent to commit an act of unlawful violence against any passenger or other person mentioned ought to go without punishment?

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not think that he ought to go without punishment if he commits any overt act.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No. The question I asked the Senator was whether or not he thought a person ought to go without punishment when he willfully and maliciously enters the car with that intent?

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not think that any man ought ever to be punished criminally for any intent which he has when he does no act to put that intent into effect.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I did not ask the Senator whether a man ought to be punished who merely has an intent to do a criminal act, but one who maliciously—the statute says "willfully and maliciously"—one who maliciously trespasses upon or enters a railroad car with that intent. There is an overt act, the overt act of entering the car maliciously.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not think that that is an overt act in the effort to put that intent into effect. But grant that he ought to be punished, does the Senator think that he ought to be sent to the penitentiary for twenty years and fined $5,000?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I do not.

Mr. McLAURIN. Then the Senator thinks this amendment ought to be adopted, or, at least, that this penalty ought to be changed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, I was going to ask the Senator, following up my other question, whether or not the effect of his amendment would not be to eliminate the first part of the law, so that such a man would not be punished at all?

Mr. McLAURIN. It would——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will permit me a moment——

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think the Senator is correct when he says that a man who enters with intent to do that particular act—knowingly to commit an act of unlawful violence—ought not to be punished by twenty years in the penitentiary, and I do not think any judge on earth would punish a man with that extreme penalty. I would have no objection if the law were so framed as to discriminate between an entry for the purpose of committing murder and robbery and an entry for the purpose of committing another act of unlawful violence; but that is not the Senator's amendment.

Mr. McLAURIN. Does not the Senator see that another section can be added putting that in? If the Senator thinks that that ought to be, the Senator agrees with me that this penalty is too severe, and, therefore, it ought to be stricken out. The Senator then agrees with me that there should be some penalty attached to the man who commits a smaller offense; but that ought to be reached by a separate section. That would not, however, obviate the necessity for the adoption of this amendment, because if you strike down this amendment and leave the penalty as it stands, then the Senator's view that the penalty is too severe will be impinged. I do not think it ought to be left to the discretion of the judge to impose such a penalty if he sees proper.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the "noes" seem to have it.

Mr. McLAURIN. I will have to call for the yeas and nays on the amendment. I can not let it go without doing everything I can to have it adopted.

Mr. KEAN. I trust the Senator will not call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. McLAURIN. I can not allow the amendment to go without a vote.

Mr. KEAN. If it is the intention to call for the yeas and nays, I think it would be as well to let the matter be passed over now, so that we may have an executive session.

Mr. McLAURIN. If the Senator from Idaho will let it go over until to-morrow, I will not call for the vote now; but if it is to be decided, I want a vote.

Mr. HEYBURN. We will let this section go over and take up the only remaining section for consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The section will be passed over without objection. The Secretary will read the next section passed over.

The Secretary resumed the reading, as follows:

SEC. 326. [The circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of South Dakota shall have jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine all actions and proceedings in which any person shall be charged with the crime of murder, manslaughter, rape, assault with intent to kill, assault with a dangerous weapon, arson, burglary, or larceny, committed within the limits of any Indian reservation in the State of South Dakota. Any person convicted of murder, manslaughter, rape, arson, or burglary, committed within the limits of any such reservation, shall be subject to the same punishment as is imposed upon persons committing said crimes within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States: Provided, That any Indian who shall commit the crime of rape within any such reservation shall be imprisoned at the discretion of the court. Any person convicted of the crime of assault with intent to kill, assault with a dangerous weapon, or larceny, committed within the limits of any such reservation, shall be subject to the same punishment as is provided in cases of other persons convicted of any of said crimes under the laws of the State of South Dakota. This section is passed in pursuance of the cession of jurisdiction contained in chapter one hundred and six, Laws of South Dakota, 1901.]

CHAPTER FIFTEEN.

REPEALING PROVISIONS.

Sec. 338. Sections, acts, and parts of acts repealed.
Sec. 339. Accrued rights, etc., not affected.
Sec. 340. Prosecutions and punishments.
Sec. 341. Acts of limitation.
Sec. 342. Date this act shall be effective.

SEC. 338. The following sections of the Revised Statutes and acts and parts of acts are hereby repealed:

Sections 412, 1553, 1668; sections 1780 to 1783, both inclusive; sections 1785, 1787, 1788, 1789 2373, 2412, 3583, 3708, 3739, 3740, 3742, 3832, 3851, 3869, 3887; sections 3890 to 3894, both inclusive; section 3899; sections 3922 to 3925, both inclusive; sections 3947, 3954, 3977, 3979; sections 3981 to 3986, both inclusive; sections 3988, 3992, 3995, 3996, 4013, 4016, 4030, 4053, 5188, 5189; sections 5281 to 5291, both inclusive; sections 5323 to 5395, both inclusive; sections 5398 to 5410, both inclusive; sections 5413 to 5484, both inclusive; sections 5487 to 5510, both inclusive; sections 5516, 5518, 5519; sections 5524 to 5535, both inclusive; sections 5551 to 5567, both inclusive, of the Revised Statutes:

That part of section 3829 of the Revised Statutes which reads as follows: "And every person who, without authority from the Postmaster-General, sets up or professes to keep any office or place of business bearing the sign, name, or title of post-office, shall, for every such offense, be liable to a penalty of not more than $500;"

That part of section 3867 of the Revised Statutes which reads as follows: "And any person not connected with the letter-carrier branch of the postal service who shall wear the uniform which may be prescribed shall, for every such offense, be punishable by a fine of not more than $100, or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or both;"

That part of section 4046 of the Revised Statutes which reads as follows: "Every postmaster, assistant, clerk, or other person employed in or connected with the business or operations of any money-order office who converts to his own use, in any way whatever, or loans, or deposits in any bank, except as authorized by this title, or exchanges for other funds, any portion of the public money-order funds, shall be deemed guilty of embezzlement; and any such person, as well as every other person advising or participating therein, shall, for every such offense, be imprisoned for not less than six months nor more than ten years, and be fined in a sum equal to the amount embezzled; and any failure to pay over or produce any money-order funds intrusted to such person shall be taken to be prima facie evidence of embezzlement; and upon the trial of any indictment against any person for such embezzlement, it shall be prima facie evidence of a balance against him to produce a transcript from the money-order account books of the Sixth Auditor. But nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit any postmaster depositing, under the direction of the Postmaster-General, in a national bank designated by the Secretary of the Treasury for that purpose, to his own credit as postmaster, any money order or other funds in his charge, nor prevent his negotiating drafts or other evidences of debt through such bank, or through United States disbursing officers, or otherwise, when instructed or required to do so by the Postmaster-General, for the purpose of remitting surplus money-order funds from one post-office to another, to be used in payment of money orders."

"An act to protect lines of telegraph constructed or used by the United States from malicious injury and obstruction," approved June 23, 1874;

"An act to protect persons of foreign birth against forcible constraint or involuntary servitude," approved June 23, 1874;

All acts of limitation, whether applicable to civil causes and proceedings, or for the recovery of penalties or forfeitures, embraced in, modified, changed, or repealed by this title, shall not be affected thereby; and all suits or proceedings for causes arising or acts done or committed prior to the taking effect hereof may be commenced and prosecuted within the same time and with the same effect as if said repeal had not been made.

SEC. 342. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after the 1st day of July, 1908.

The reading of the passed-over sections was concluded.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask now to recur to section 319. The committee accept the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] to strike out beginning with the word "or," after the word "robbery," down to and including the word "thereon," in line 10 of the section, and insert after the word "both," in line 5, of the bill, I think it is——

Mr. MCLAURIN. After the period.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; after the period at the end, what I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 164, line 5, after the period, following the word "both," it is proposed to insert:

Whoever shall wilfully and maliciously trespass upon or enter upon any railroad train, railroad car, or railroad locomotive with intent to commit any unlawful violence upon or against any passenger on said train or car or upon or against any engineer, conductor, fireman, brakeman, or any officer or employee connected with said locomotive, train, or car, or upon or against any express messenger or mail agent on said train or in any car thereof, or to commit any crime or offense against any person or property thereon shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to recur to section 218. We have reached an agreement in regard to the section. The amendment which was adopted yesterday is withdrawn, and I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PILES in the chair). The amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 218 and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 218. [All kinds of poison, and all articles and compositions containing poison, and all poisonous animals, insects, and reptiles, liquids, liquors, glass, and explosives of all kinds, and inflammable materials, and infernal machines, and mechanical, chemical, or other devices or compositions which may ignite or explode, and all disease germs or scabs, and all other natural or artificial articles, compositions, or materials of whatever kind which may kill, or in any wise hurt, harm, or injure another, or damage, deface, or otherwise injure the mails or other property, whether sealed as first-class matter or not, are hereby declared to be nonmailable matter, and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post-office or station thereof, nor by any letter carrier.

Whoever shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited for mailing or delivery, or shall knowingly cause to be delivered by mail according to the direction thereon, or at any place at which it is directed to be delivered by the person to whom it is addressed, anything declared by this section to be nonmailable, shall be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than two years, or both; and whoever shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited for mailing or delivery, or shall knowingly cause to be delivered by mail according to the directions thereon, or at any place to which it is directed to be delivered by the person to whom it is addressed, anything declared by this section to be nonmailable, with the design, intent, or purpose to kill, or in any wise hurt, harm, or injure another, or damage, deface, or otherwise injure the mails or other property, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than ten years, or both.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. I desire to call the attention of Senators to a section that was passed over, and I shall ask to have it stricken out. It is section 20 of the bill. It is a reenactment of section 5509 of the Revised Statutes. It is intended as a corollary to the preceding section. My opinion is that the preceding section ought to be entirely repealed, although that is not the matter that I now bring to the attention of the Senate. The preceding section was a political act enacted in a time of great political excitement and sectional difference and animosity. It was designed, not for general application in the United States, but for particular application to a part of the United States. If there ever were any conditions which justified such an enactment, which I deny, those conditions have entirely disappeared, and the act is a blot upon the statute book to-day.

Section 19 is a reenactment of section 5508, which is directed against persons who shall "conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States."

Now that section has for its violation a distinct penalty attached to it. It is that persons who shall violate the provisions of this section "shall be fined not more than $5,000 and imprisoned not more than ten years; and shall, moreover, be thereafter ineligible to any office, or place of honor, profit, or trust created by the Constitution or laws of the United States."

The succeeding section, to which I now direct attention, is as follows:

If in the act violating any provision of the preceding section any other felony or misdemeanor be committed, the offender shall be punished for the same with such punishment as is attached to such felony or misdemeanor by the laws of the State in which the offense is committed.

That section of law—it is existing law—is used as a cloak and a pretense by which courts of the United States take jurisdiction of criminal offenses against the State, and upon a mere allegation in an indictment that there has been a conspiracy, there is a prosecution for murder or for any other offense which it may be alleged was committed in pursuance or while in the execution of that conspiracy or attempt to violate the personal rights of anyone.

If it were true that there was no offense except that which is specified in section 20, or section 5509 of the Revised Statutes, then it might be said that to repeal that section would be to take away from the penalty of the law the only thing which could make the law effective. But the law, so far as it is directed against an offense against the United States, is complete in itself in the preceding section and has the penalty attached. This other is a section which purports to punish for a crime altogether independent, so far as being separate and distinct may make it independent, of any crime specified in the preceding section and upon which jurisdiction can be rested.

Now, this is not a theoretical matter with me. I have seen it in practical operation, where the Federal courts have undertaken, and not only have undertaken but have acquired—taken jurisdiction of plain crimes against the State and prosecuted men for crimes against the State, the simple allegation being made that there had been a conspiracy, and upon little or no testimony whatever of any such conspiracy the Federal courts proceed to exercise jurisdiction, try, and punish parties for alleged crimes against the State.

I have, in my own experience, known of a case of that kind where parties were charged with having conspired, in the language of this law, and then having committed a murder. I will say, for the information of Senators, that there was no question of race involved in the matter. They were all white men. I have known a most protracted trial—I was engaged in it myself—lasting over a month, where parties convicted, some of them sentenced to the penitentiary for life and others for shorter terms, and where after ten years' service in the penitentiary the President of the United States pardoned the only remaining one of the convicts upon the recommendation of the Attorney-General of the United States, based upon the distinct ground that under the record they ought never to have been convicted.

It was a plain case that if the parties were guilty at all of an offense against the State laws there was not a scintilla of evidence upon which to rest any indictment for conspiracy. The judge charged the jury that if they did not think there was any conspiracy they did not have any jurisdiction. But all that was lost in a trial extending over a long period of time, in which, if the facts sworn to were true, there had been committed a crime of great enormity, one which shocked the public sense, and the question of jurisdiction disappeared in the case altogether.

There is no reason in the world, in my mind, why there should be any such statute on the Federal statute book. The State, it is intended, shall always be the one to try for offenses against the State; and if there should be such a conspiracy and if in the course of the conspiracy the parties should commit murder, there are two distinct offenses—the offense against the Federal law, in the conspiracy to deprive one of the exercise of his rights; the offense against the State, in the commission of the murder. While the Federal court can try the offense under the statute, under the section of law found in section 5508, Revised Statutes, the State court is the one which should be empowered to try the offense committed under section 5509.

I therefore move to amend by striking out that section, because it has no place in Federal law proper.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, this section is the one under which, perhaps, the parties who raided the interstate railroads at Chicago during the riots and upset and burned cars would be prosecuted. It is, perhaps, the section under which the people who set fire to the roundhouses at Pittsburg in 1877 and burned them up would be prosecuted.

Mr. BACON. I think not.

Mr. HEYBURN. They went there, they said, for the purpose of persuading in a peaceful way the workmen of the railroads to quit their employment, but while they say they went there for that purpose, before they left they burned 3,500 cars and 135 engines, and thereby interrupted interstate commerce practically on the line between two States, and interrupted it for a long time.

I merely call attention to that class of offenses. I know the mind of the Senator from Georgia has been directed toward another class of offenses, but we should be careful about repealing a statute that may be of very widespread usefulness merely because it may have been invoked in some cases where it would seem to be unnecessary. So I think we should be very careful about repealing this section.

The section covers the grave offenses that are committed by men who go into action with perhaps a slight purpose as to the commission of an offense, but become involved in controversies that result either in the destruction of life, as it did in both those cases, or the destruction of property; that affect not local rights within a State, but interstate rights. In fact, in that same case the riots extended clear across the State line. They tied up interstate commerce between Chicago and the Atlantic seaboard, and not only tied it up, but destroyed life and property. It is such sections as these that we must look to for the prosecutions of those offenses in the United States courts. The Senator, I think, will agree with me that even though the section may be available upon which to base a prosecution for some offense that might seem to belong to State jurisdiction, yet if a statute is necessary for the purpose of preventing or punishing the commission of very grave offenses of a character that are undoubtedly within the cognizance and jurisdiction of United States courts, we should not lightly repeal it. I submit these considerations to the Senator.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho has been discussing with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN] a question which involved the acts of labor unions, etc., and he seems to have forgotten the fact that we are no longer discussing that. What he has said will apply to an altogether different class of offenses from those expressed in section 5508.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to make a suggestion? It has occurred to me that if this is the only question left for discussion before the bill shall be reported to the Senate, it might be settled when we get into the Senate.

Mr. BACON. No; I can not consent to that.

Mr. CULLOM. We can not settle a contested question when there are so few Senators present.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator desires to move an executive session, of course I will not interfere with him. But I am not going to consent that this matter shall go to the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. I was in hopes that the Senator from Idaho might get his bill into the Senate before adjournment to-day.

Mr. BACON. No; there are some other matters to which I wish to call attention.

Mr. CULLOM. Then, with the permission of the Senator from Georgia, I will make a motion.

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 20, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

The special committee which was directed to report to the House plans for the distribution of rooms in the House Office Building and the redistribution of rooms under the control of the House in the Capitol building beg leave to make a partial report and to recommend the adoption of the following resolution, to wit:

Resolved, That the Resident Commissioners to the United States elected by the Philippine legislature be accorded the same rights as to allotment and use of rooms in the House Office Building as are Members of the House.

JAMES R. MANN.
JOSEPH H. GAINES.
JAMES T. LLOYD.
W. C. ADAMSON.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, I desire to ask for a change of reference of the bills which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. By direction of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, the gentleman from New York moves to change the reference of the bills of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 16514. A bill to amend section 13 of the naturalization laws.
H. R. 16509. A bill to amend section 12 of the naturalization laws.

The SPEAKER. What is the motion of the gentleman?

Mr. BENNET of New York. To refer the bills to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, taking them from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BENNET of New York, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to was laid on the table.

SANTEE RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10671) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent in fee simple for certain lands of the Santee Reservation, in Nebraska, to the directors of school district No. 36, in Knox County, Nebr.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Has the bill been reported from the committee?

Mr. BOYD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. And is on the Calendar?

Mr. BOYD. Yes, sir. It has the unanimous report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. The Chair will say to the gentleman that the bill is in order on any Friday except on the second and fourth Fridays of each month. The bill is upon the Private Calendar. The Chair was under the impression when he recognized the gentleman that the bill was on the House Calendar. As there is a way provided under the rules for the consideration on the two Fridays mentioned, pursuing the practice adopted by the Chair, the Chair can not submit the matter for unanimous consent.

EXTENSION OF GENERAL DEBATE.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of asking that I may be allowed unanimous consent to address the House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for ten minutes when the House goes into committee on the census bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to address the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for ten minutes on the census bill when the House goes into committee upon that bill. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. That is, to extend general debate on that subject? The gentleman desires to extend general debate for ten minutes?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

THE THIRTEENTH CENSUS.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill providing for the Thirteenth decennial census.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 16954) to provide for the taking of the Thirteenth Census, with Mr. FULLER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16954) to provide for the Thirteenth decennial census, and in accordance with the order of the House the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. We were delighted on yesterday with the elegant and eloquent language of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL], and there is now no intention to unjustly depreciate the encomium so gracefully paid the honored Speaker of the House. It is only my desire to call attention of the committee to a part of the language used by that versatile gentleman, as follows:

> And so he has been able to carry through the important measures recommended by the President by giving to them the great weight of his authority. The passage of the employers' liability bill, the pure food, meat inspection, and railroad rate bills was made certain by his advocacy. In faithfully representing the farmers and toilers of his own district he has served all the workers of the country. The people of his district have conferred upon him all the honors that are in their gift to bestow, single handed and alone. And the thought that comes to my mind on this anniversary of our country colleague's first triumph in this House, a triumph won in the interest of the workers of the country, is simply this: How gladly within the next few months the other plain people who live on farms or work in mines or shops will join the voters of his district to reward this their faithful servant, who went forth in their cause thirty-four years ago with oats in his pocket and returned bringing his sheaves with him, by conferring upon him the nation's final honor. [Prolonged general cheering and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, it may be assumed that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] spoke with authority when he referred to the distinguished Speaker of this House as the representative of the farmers, those who work in the shops, and those who toil in the mines. That being the case, we may conclude that he is sincere. If that be true, there are certain matters before Congress that may be promptly brought to passage. Let me mention some that may with propriety and justice be called to the immediate attention of the House and speedily passed if you mean what you say in your panegyric. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] now sits immediately under my eye and within sound of my voice. If he will rise from his seat any day and address the Speaker and ask unanimous consent that certain meritorious bills may be taken up and passed at once, we pledge him every Democratic vote on this side of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If the Speaker is really "faithfully representing the farmers and toilers of his own district" and is truly the friend to "the other plain people who live on farms or work in mines or shops" and the gentleman [Mr. BOUTELL] truly reflects the character of this "good friend" to the people, I am quite sure he has the eye, the ear, and the heart of "their faithful servant" and will have no difficulty in now receiving recognition from this Presidential candidate to call up the several measures so long justly demanded by the same "farmers, toilers, and miners." Will he do it, and put this "friend of the people" to this fair and reasonable test? If he will get the recognition, we tender him every Democratic vote here and now to aid him in such a movement fraught with so much good to the masses of the people.

Mr. Chairman, the President of the United States, in his pyrotechnical message of a few days ago, mentioned the employers liability bill and urged speedy action by Congress. That bill is now pending before the Committee on the Judiciary, where the attorneys and representatives of many of the great corporations of this country are contesting its favorable report. They are throwing their whole strength against it and are doing everything in their power to thwart the will of the people, the message of the President, and manifest justice. If the gentleman represents the Speaker and will call up the Sterling bill, introduced by a Representative from his own State, every Representative on this side of the House stands ready to discharge the committee and speedily pass a bill embodying the principles contained therein by a vote of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This is only one of the meritorious measures alluded to by the President. The gentleman refers to the Speaker as representing the miners, the toilers, and the workingmen of this country. We hope such is true; and yet for months and years these same miners, workingmen, and toilers have besought the constituted authorities of this House for just legislation, and the honorable Speaker and the Republican party have spurned their demands. One of your candidates for President—Mr. Taft—has declared in favor of a bill requiring notice before injunctions shall be issued by a Federal judge. Secretary Taft recently said:

> You ask me what I think of a provision that no restraining order or injunction shall issue except after notice to the defendant and a hearing is had. This was the rule under the Federal statutes for many years, but it was subsequently repealed. In the classes of cases to which you refer I do not see any objection to the reenactment of that Federal statute. Indeed, I have taken occasion to say in public speeches that the power to issue injunctions ex parte has given rise to certain abuses and injustices to the laborers engaged in a peaceful strike. Men leave employment on a strike, counsel for the employer applies to a judge and presents an affidavit averring fear of threatened violence and making such a case of the ex parte statement that the judge feels called upon to issue a temporary restraining order. The temporary restraining order is served upon all the strikers; they are not lawyers; their fears are aroused by the process with which they are not acquainted, and, although their purpose may have been entirely lawful, their common determination to carry through the strike is weakened by an order which they have never had an opportunity to question and which is calculated to discourage their proceeding in their original purpose. To avoid this injustice, I believe, as I have already said, that the Federal statute might well be made what it was originally, requiring notice and a hearing before an injunction issues.

The President in his recent message, in plain words, asks that Congress pass such a bill, which has been pending for years before this House. He says:

> I again call your attention to the need of some action in connection with the abuse of injunctions in labor cases. * * * As regards injunctions, I can do little but repeat what I have said in my last message to the Congress. * * * The fact that the punishment for the violation of an injunction must, to make the order effective, necessarily be summary and without the intervention of a jury, makes its issuance in doubtful cases a dangerous practice, and in itself furnishes a reason why the process should be surrounded with safeguards to protect individuals against being enjoined from exercising their proper rights. Reasonable notice should be given the adverse party. This matter is daily becoming of graver importance, and I can not too urgently recommend that the Congress give careful consideration to the subject.

Gentlemen, I had the honor of introducing such a bill at several sessions of Congress, long before the President mentioned it. It is a plain and simple measure. It has now received the sanction of the President's approval; one of the candidates from Ohio has also approved the measure. It would be gratifying to have the recognition and approval of the distinguished Presidential candidate from Illinois. The bill is short and I will read its exact language:

That no writ of injunction or temporary restraining order shall be granted in any case without reasonable previous notice to the adverse party, or his attorney, of the time and place of moving for the same: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be held to authorize the issuance of any injunction or restraining order not now authorized by law.

Gentlemen, such was the law for more than three-quarters of a century. It was inadvertently changed when the statutes of the United States were recodified. If your Speaker wishes to reflect the views of "the workers, the miners, and toilers," and you think such legislation just, indicate it by calling it up in the House of Representatives, and we stand ready to give you every Democratic vote here. [Applause.]

What says the gentleman from Illinois about the distinguished Speaker of the House of Representatives? If he advisedly spoke of him in his eloquent remarks of yesterday as being the friend of the laborers, toilers, and miners, he certainly would enjoy the confidence of the Speaker sufficiently to receive recognition from him to demand the passage of the bill. Gentlemen, are you sincere, are you in earnest? And will the gentleman from Illinois ask recognition of the Speaker and demand that this bill be passed? That is the test of good faith on the subject. There are other just measures that might be mentioned, but time forbids. Permit me to refer to one other. We believe, and some of you say you think, there ought to be trial by jury in cases of indirect contempt of Federal judges. If you do, there have been several bills introduced in the House and referred to the Judiciary Committee providing such procedure. If the gentleman from Illinois thoroughly represents the views of the Speaker, Democrats here stand and pledge our solid support and will pass such measure on any day you call it up.

Gentlemen, I am not making these remarks in criticism of the distinguished Speaker of this House. They are made not to offensively disparage any committee. But it is known that the laboring classes, the toilers, and miners have been knocking at the doors of Congress year after year for such relief. As an humble member of the Committee on the Judiciary, I declare they are not making unreasonable demands. They ask only even-handed justice. They are willing to take a fair employers' liability bill. They will accept the measure giving trial by jury in cases of constructive contempt. They will be satisfied with reasonable and just legislation. The distinguished gentleman [Mr. BOUTELL] assures us that the Speaker is a friend of the toilers and laborers of this country. If that be authority from the throne, cease discussion and let some gentleman call upon the Speaker, as he has been often called upon before, and demand that he recognize some Member to take up these important acts, and we will see which side of the House is in good faith. We challenge you to such action to-day, to-morrow, and every day. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will commence the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

That a census of the population, agriculture, manufactures, and mines and quarries of the United States shall be taken by the Director of the Census in the year 1910, and once every ten years thereafter. The census herein provided for shall include each State and Territory on the mainland of the United States, the District of Columbia, and the Territories of Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico, and Guam, Samoa, and the Panama Canal Zone.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I have two amendments to offer to section 1.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "the Territories of," in line 9, page 1, after the word "and;" and strike out the word "and," after the word "Hawaii," line 9, page 1.

Strike out the word "Samoa," line 10, and insert "and other islands in the Pacific Ocean except the Philippine Islands."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of that amendment is to avoid characterizing any of the political nondescript islands as Territories of the United States. If the amendment be adopted, the section will be amended so as to read, "the District of Columbia, and Hawaii, Porto Rico, and Guam and other islands of the Pacific Ocean, excepting the Philippine Islands."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by adding, in line 9, after the word "and," before the words "Porto Rico," the words "the island of," and strike out all of line 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to amend the amendment and the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 9, before the words "Porto Rico," insert the words "the island of," and strike out all of line 10.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may report the way the paragraph would read with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, and then again as it would read with that offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

The census herein provided for shall include each State and Territory in the mainland of the United States, the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and Guam and other islands in the Pacific Ocean except the Philippine Islands and the Panama Canal Zone.

As amended it would read:

The District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, and the island of Porto Rico.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask somebody who knows the most a question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the gentleman will propound his question we will know what witness to summon. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I will take the gentleman from Indiana. What have we got to do with the taking of the census on the Panama Canal Zone?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There are several thousand citizens there, and will be there at the time the census is taken, who will not be enumerated here. I have an amendment to offer in the way of a proviso to this section of the bill authorizing the President of the United States to make the enumeration and inquiries provided in the bill through the Secretary of War for the Panama Canal Zone and through the Secretary of the Navy for the Pacific islands.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How are these fellows going to be paid who take the census, by the head?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The bill provides a schedule of pay of so much for each inhabitant and so much for each house. Where conditions are exceptional, the Director of the Census is authorized to fix a per diem of not less than $3 nor more than $6 a day.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If they be paid so much a head, men, women, and children, do you not think that it would be a temptation to put on the list every man, woman, and child that they can find on the Zone, no matter where they live nor to whom they owe allegiance?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is likely that the census will be taken through the War Department by officers already in the service of the Government on the Panama Canal Zone. That is an amendment that I intend to propose to this section. So I do not think that that danger will be at all considerable; in fact it will be a negligible quantity.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When they take the census in Washington they take all of us and our wives and our children and other members of the household as citizens of Washington, and then we are also taken at home as citizens of the place where we live.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Missouri might be taken as a citizen in half a dozen places and do them all honor. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know, but I am not six persons, even if I would do honor to six places. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That criticism would overturn the entire census. It is liable to happen unless the supervisors and enumerators are carefully instructed to inquire into the actual residence of each person he examines. There is in the general taking of a census the temptation on the part of the enumerators paid by fees to increase the enumeration and list to include everybody there is any doubt about in order to get larger pay. On the other hand, if a per diem shall be paid, there is an equal temptation to prolong the work, the enumerator's districts will have to be made smaller, and it is a danger that probably is slight, but one that can not be overcome. The bill provides for the taking of the census in the same manner that it has been taken in this respect, that is, the enumeration, for a half century and probably more, and all those questions have been considered and determined in years past and our committee discussed that phase of the administrative work and reached the conclusion that this method is perhaps the best and most practical after all that could be devised.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], as I understand it, compels us to take the census of every island in the Pacific Ocean except the Philippines. There are, I suppose, a hundred thousand islands in the Pacific Ocean; they belong to every government in the world, and they are subject to the jurisdiction of Germany, Japan, France, and other countries.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS] prepared this amendment and I did not scrutinize it carefully.

Mr. PARSONS. As we have no jurisdiction to take the census of any island except those that belong to us, any construction of that amendment would mean our islands.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I appreciate the force of the criticism made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS], and I ask unanimous consent to amend the amendment by adding after the words "Pacific Ocean" the words "under the jurisdiction of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to amend his amendment by adding the words "under the jurisdiction of the United States" after the words "Pacific Ocean." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that the suggestion I first made was the simplest of all, and that was to strike out all the special names and say the census should cover all places subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, except the Philippine Islands. That is the language used in the revised statutes, and in the revision of the penal code that the House has been considering, and is the simplest that you can have.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I would say in answer to my colleague that apart from the verbal criticism of the amendment, personally it seems to me a very foolish and injudicious waste of money for the census to be taken of these remote islands, scattered all over the face of the earth. To know the conditions of agriculture in our own country, the conditions of manufacture and trade is well, but for saying that for any reason every five years we should find out the conditions of agriculture in Guam and Samoa and the islands of the sea of which we may be possessed, it seems to me such a proposition can not commend itself to the good judgment of the House.

The commission that was appointed to investigate this subject, like all commissions, has gone wild with the desire to increase its own field of activity, and instead of submitting a proposition for the census of our own land, the necessity of which we all admit, adds to it propositions that must demand large expense, and, as it seems to me, with no possible practical, material, or justifiable results.

Mr. PARSONS. The amendment that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] has provides that the census in these particular islands shall be taken by the Navy Department.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that we had better accept the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY]. I do not see any particular need of taking a census of the people of Guam and Samoa and the Panama Canal Zone. As I understand, that provision was put in the bill at the request of some gentleman who went over this question and thought that all of the dependencies of the United States should be included in the Thirteenth Census. Now, in order that we may get on, I suggest to the gentleman that he accept the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota, which will do away with the taking of the census in those three dependencies, or whatever you may call them, and confine it to the United States and the Island of Porto Rico.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I could not accept the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota if I would, and I would hardly feel inclined to do so anyway. I want the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to settle this question. I think it is a matter of some importance to enumerate the population in the islands of Guam and Samoa, and there are other inhabited islands in the Pacific Ocean under the jurisdiction of the United States, Midway and others. There is a population in Guam of some ten or twelve thousand people, and I think the census of population ought to include all of the population in the territory of the United States, and if there be any manufacturing industries there, we ought to have a census of those. We ought to know the extent of our population, the extent of our manufactures, our industrial resources, wherever they may be located. There never has been an official census of any of the Pacific Islands, excepting the Philippines. We took a census of the Philippines, or ordered it to be taken, in 1903. Now, there are a great many islands in the Pacific Ocean, but only a few of them are inhabited—I mean a few of those under the jurisdiction of the United States.

It is not a difficult thing to take a census of population of these islands in the manner we propose it shall be taken. They are subject to the control of the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Navy can require an enumeration of population and manufactures, if there be any in the islands, have the reports sent to him, and he can forward the reports to the Census Office for compilation and tabulation. It will not be a difficult or expensive thing to do, and it is not intended to take the census of these islands every five years, only decennially.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption right there?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will.

Mr. TAWNEY. Has not the Secretary of the Navy now the power to order an enumeration of the people residing in the islands of Samoa and Guam?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It may be that he has that power, but he has not exercised it.

Mr. TAWNEY. He has not been requested to exercise it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, we are requesting him now to exercise it in the form of this bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. We do not need any law for that purpose.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We need some authority directing him to exercise it.

Mr. TAWNEY. The law now exists.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. An enumeration must be taken in harmony with the enumeration in the United States proper. The schedules must substantially conform to them in order that there may be proper coordination, in order that they may be properly systematized, in order that their real comparative significance may be made clear.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question about the United States "improper." Is this island of Samoa divided into three different parts, over one of which we have exclusive jurisdiction and in the others the jurisdiction is with the other two nations?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand that in an international partition proceeding we obtained control and title to the entire island of Tutuila, I think its proper name is. It has been called Samoa because it is one of the Samoan group. As I understand it, the United States Government has jurisdiction over the entire island of Tutuila.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it a part of the United States, or have we simply established a directorate over it by consent of Germany and England?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, that is a problem I think it would be very difficult for me to answer offhand.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Or on hand either, I guess.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Or on hand either; I admit that is true. I do not really understand it myself.

Mr. PARSONS. It is part of the United States.

Mr. TAWNEY. Attention has been called to the fact that this amendment as it now reads provides for taking a census of all of the islands of the Pacific Ocean under the jurisdiction of the United States. That means taking a census of fifty-four islands independent of the Philippine Islands. There are fifty-four islands in the Pacific Ocean under the jurisdiction of the United States, including the Aleutian Islands, nearly all of which are inhabited either by human beings or by seal life, animals, or birds. The island of Midway, referred to by the gentleman from Indiana, is inhabited only by birds; there is not a human being on the island. As to the census of Samoa and Guam, the Secretary of the Navy to-day has complete control over those islands. He has authority to order the taking of a census of them, and the census thus taken can be harmonized with the census to be taken under this law. All that is necessary will be for the Census Bureau to make out the classifications and request the Secretary of the Navy to take the census there just as the Census Bureau will take the census in the United States. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that we want to authorize under this act the Census Bureau to go out to Samoa, or to send special agents there for the purpose of taking this census, which it would be competent for the Director of the Census to do if we include this language I propose to strike out. The proposition as proposed in this bill is a sort of blanket commission to take the census under this law of all the islands in the Pacific Ocean, aggregating some fifty-four. In view of the fact that the Secretary of the Navy now has that power and would unquestionably exercise it at the request and under the forms prescribed by the Director of the Census, it is absolutely unnecessary for us to give this specific authority. Now, so far as the Isthmian Canal Zone is concerned——

Mr. DRISCOLL. Before leaving that point, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. DRISCOLL. The appendix contained in this report states that estimates have been made of the population in the islands of Samoa and of Guam, and there is made a summary of the population of the United States and its dependencies——

Mr. MANN. What page is that?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Does the gentleman know by whom those estimates were made?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know by whom they were made. I think, however, they were made by the Navy Department. A naval officer is in control of the island of Guam. I do not know who is in control of the island of Tutuila, which is the island under our jurisdiction in the Samoan group.

Mr. McCALL. May I ask the gentleman a question? Would not the inclusion of these islands in this bill give to the work of the Navy Department an official sanction, and make this an official census of the places under the jurisdiction of the United States?

Mr. TAWNEY. Not any more so than the present authority which is vested in the Secretary of the Navy to take the census or enumeration. He may take it as he sees fit. It is reasonable to suppose, however, if he did take it, he would take it in accordance with the regulations of the Census Bureau, and have that census conform, as to the population of those islands, to the returns made by the enumerators that are to take the census in the United States.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Inasmuch as Congress is providing now for a general census of population throughout the United States, supposedly including most all of American territory, if we should strike out Guam, Tutuila, and other inhabited islands in the Pacific, the Secretary of the Navy, if he has discretionary power to make the official enumeration of population, would conclude that Congress did not desire any such enumeration?

Mr. TAWNEY. Not at all.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We are engaged in a business now of providing for a census of population and other things, and it will naturally be presumed we only wanted the census embraced within the geographical area described in the bill; and if the Secretary of the Navy does have the discretionary power, we want the Secretary to exercise the power at a particular time and in a particular way. He may not exercise it at all. He may conclude that it is not necessary for his purposes to take any census there.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the very reason given for excluding these two islands, namely, because the Secretary has the power to take this census independent of this authority, would be taken into consideration by him, and he would for that reason consider it his duty to take the census, whereas if we include it he will know that he is not to do it, but that it is to be done under the Census Bureau, and hence the necessity on the part of the Census Bureau to send special agents or enumerators out there for the purpose of taking the census, which, when it is completed, will be of no material advantage or benefit to anybody.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] to say that he proposed to offer an amendment providing that the census in the Canal Zone and in these islands should not be taken by the Census Office. If such an amendment be offered and adopted, that obviates the question of sending enumerators there. Now, is not this the situation: The Secretary of the Navy now has the authority to take the census of Samoa and Tutuila or other islands that have been placed under his control by the President, but when the census is taken nobody can find it. It is not published in the census report. Is not the only effect of this to provide that the census of these islands and the Canal Zone, when taken by the War Department and the Navy Department, shall be transmitted to the Director of the Census and published along with the rest of the census reports, where they will be able to find them? I dare say there is no Member of this House who now knows where to go, except to the Department itself, to ascertain in regard to the census of either Samoa or the other islands.

Mr. TAWNEY. The estimated population of these islands now published by the Census Bureau is a complete answer to the proposition advanced by the gentleman from Illinois. If the census is taken by the Secretary of the Navy that census would be reported to the Census Bureau and be published as a part of the census reports, just as it is now.

Mr. PARSONS. Under what authority?

Mr. TAWNEY. Under the authority which the Census Bureau has in the act creating a permanent census organization.

Now, in regard to the Isthmian Canal, Mr. Chairman, I can see no earthly reason, being somewhat familiar with conditions down there, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] also is, in our making any provision whatever or going to the expense of carrying out the provision of this bill in respect to the Isthmian Canal Zone.

The enumeration of American citizens is all that can possibly be done. There is no American there that is not an employee of the Government. There are about 6,000 American employees, and the Isthmian Canal Commission has a complete record of the number of members of each of the American families that are there. They have got a complete record of every American citizen that is there. The number of American citizens that are there change constantly, and a census taken to-day is no indication of what the conditions are, or what number of Americans may be there to-morrow. They are all there temporarily. There are none of them there who expect to remain there, and they never remain there longer than one year. So that a census, I do not care how it is taken, will be of no value for the purpose of furnishing reliable information during the period of canal construction. And, as I said on yesterday, those who are there temporarily, if they are single men or single women, will be enumerated at their homes in this country, because of their being only temporarily absent. On the contrary, if a married man is there and his family here, he certainly will be enumerated here; and you are simply duplicating and piling up unnecessary expense in the taking of this census, I care not whether it be taken by the Census Bureau or under the direction of the President of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to me for another question?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will.

Mr. MANN. Would it obviate at all the gentleman's objection if the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana should provide that the census of these places should be taken, not under this act, but under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, respectively, so that all the minutiæ provided in this act and the expense might be done away with, and all the facts ascertained in the easiest and very simple way, and the report made to the Director of the Census?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War would simply prescribe regulations for taking the census of the population at those different places, that would remove a great deal of the objection that I have; but what assurance have we that as a matter of convenience, and to save labor, the two Secretaries named will not simply embody the provisions of this bill, so far as the bill authorizes the taking of the census as to population, manufactures, and everything else is concerned, and call that their regulation for taking the census in those islands and in the Isthmian Canal Zone? I say, Mr. Chairman, that there is absolutely no necessity for authorizing this to be done under any authority, because we now know, or can easily ascertain, how many American citizens are there.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. Has not the gentleman occupied more than five minutes? According to the clock, he has occupied the floor for fifteen minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not think I have occupied more than five minutes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. You talked about fifteen minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have taken about five minutes, and the rest of the time has been occupied by the gentleman from Indiana and gentlemen on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair states that, in his opinion, the question must first be taken on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, and the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota will come afterwards.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a motion to close debate. I move that all debate on the section and amendments thereto be closed in ten minutes.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. TAWNEY. There is another proposition involving another question in this same section.

Mr. MANN. There is a proposition of greater importance than the one we have discussed.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Then the probabilities are we will not get past this section to-day. However, I withdraw the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana. In order that there may be no mistake, the Clerk will report the amendment again.

Mr. TAWNEY. A parliamentary inquiry. My amendment was offered as an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota comes after, as an independent amendment. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana will be disposed of first.

Mr. KEIFER. As I understood the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, it was offered in the form of an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is an independent amendment.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana proposes to add to the section, or change the section and insert?

The CHAIRMAN. That can be voted on after the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana has been disposed of.

Mr. MANN. We insert certain possessions of the United States, naming them. The amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota proposes to strike those very identical places. Now, after having adopted the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, it is out of order to propose to change the very thing that the House has adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana simply perfects the text. It can afterwards be stricken out by subsequent amendment. Let the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend so that lines 6 to 10 shall read as follows:

"The census herein provided for shall include each State and Territory on the mainland of the United States, the District of Columbia, and Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and Guam, and other islands in the Pacific Ocean under the jurisdiction of the United States, except the Philippine Islands and the Panama Canal Zone."

Mr. DRISCOLL. I did not understand whether the Panama Canal Zone was excepted from or included in the census under this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands the amendment, it is included.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I think it would be excluded.

Mr. KEIFER. Has debate been closed on this amendment?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Debate has long been exhausted on this amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

I confess that there is a good deal of confusion in my mind as to the exact status of the provision of this census bill now under consideration, and I am not very clear about what is sought to be accomplished by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana. But I understand that if the bill becomes a law, he intends to take a census of the Canal Zone. It is not a well-defined amendment as I understand it. Are we to take a census of everything within the Canal Zone, 10 miles in width? That includes the cities of Colon and Panama for some purposes. Are we to take a census of the cities of Colon and Panama under this proposition? It is so indefinite that I do not think anybody could tell what the provision was after he had it carefully written out and considered it with some degree of deliberation. If we are to take a census of the cities of Colon and Panama, we ought to say so. If we are not to take that, we ought to say it in such words as indicate that we do not intend to do it.

I wish to say that in the city of Colon we have located, in connection with the work going on on the Isthmus, a hospital, I think a laundry, and probably the largest bakery in operation in the world.

Mr. TAWNEY. And an ice plant.

Mr. KEIFER. And an ice plant, as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations suggests. If we are not going to take the census of the city of Colon then we are not going to get a perfect census of all the people that we have employed down there in the building of the canal.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly; but I shall have to have more time.

Mr. TAWNEY. The city of Colon and the city of Panama are under the control of the United States for certain purposes, and for those purposes are included in the Canal Zone.

Mr. KEIFER. I have already tried to state that.

Mr. MANN. They are not in the Canal Zone. They are expressly excepted.

Mr. KEIFER. They are under the control of the United States for certain purposes and so far as relates to city sanitation and the control of quarantine at the ports of Colon and Panama. All that jurisdiction, so far as the United States goes, is complete. The waterworks system is under our control and we have something to do with the school system. Just what the measure of that all is I do not know, but I want to find out before I vote, as I have no doubt other Members would like to know what they are voting for.

I want to find out whether it is proposed to take the census of these cities, and further, whether or not it is worth while to take the census of the people employed there, whose names we have on our rolls now, to the extent of at least thirty-one or thirty-two thousand people. We know the number of such people as we employ every month of every year, and we will continue to know their number until the end of the work. Do we want to get a census of the natives of Jamaica and the natives of South Africa who are employed there? Do we want to find out how many Portuguese are at work there? If we do, a telegram to Mr. Joseph B. Bishop, the secretary of the Commission at Ancon, on the Isthmus, or to the head of that great work, Colonel Goethals, will get a response this afternoon telling us just what the number is. If you want to work out a census down there, it will be easier to do it through the authorities now on the Isthmus than to include this in the problem of taking the next census of the whole United States.

I am not prepared to say that I think it is fair to leave out a census of the Philippine Islands. There are only 3,141 of them, so far as discovered, and why not take the census, as the Constitution of the United States provides it shall be taken, every ten years? Those islands belong to us.

Mr. GARRETT. Does the Constitution go there?

Mr. KEIFER. Of course it goes there, for some purposes.

Mr. GARRETT. To the Philippines?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. KEIFER. The Constitution goes wherever the flag goes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to ask the gentleman when the Constitution got there?

Mr. KEIFER. The Constitution always goes with the flag.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did not the Supreme Court decide that it did not go with the flag?

Mr. KEIFER. No; but not for all purposes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then I can not read.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to strike out the last two words of the amendment in order that I may have some facts to determine whether or not I am correctly informed. If I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, it does nothing more than change the language found in the original bill, and if adopted we will take the census in all the possessions of the United States, including the Panama Canal Zone.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. All except the Philippines.

Mr. BUTLER. All except the Philippines.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. All the inhabited possessions.

Mr. BUTLER. All the inhabited possessions. Now, if this amendment is adopted, we will have an opportunity to vote on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, and I understand by his amendment he proposes to eliminate the islands of the Pacific and the Panama Canal Zone.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not propose to eliminate Hawaii, of course.

Mr. BUTLER. All except the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. TAWNEY. There are none others except Guam and Samoa.

Mr. BUTLER. But you propose also to eliminate the Canal Zone?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. I understand the Chair has ruled that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is first in order. Now, if that be voted into the bill, then will the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, it would.

Mr. GARRETT. If it be voted out of the bill, what then will be the parliamentary situation?

Mr. TAWNEY. I assume that if the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is not adopted, then my amendment would be in order. It would be in order either way, whether the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is voted down or voted up.

Mr. GARRETT. The amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota was offered as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. The Chair holds that it was an independent amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the parliamentary question is settled, are we ready for a vote?

Mr. DRISCOLL. I move to strike out the last three words, and that will accomplish exactly what I want to have done. The gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of the committee, as I understood him, said that he was not strenuous about having the Panama Canal Zone kept in the bill or having a census taken of that neck of land. I understood the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], the ranking Democratic member of this committee, to agree with him. Now, if we strike out the Panama Canal Zone altogether and eliminate it from consideration in the taking of the census, then we can consider the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota afterwards. But I think nearly everybody in the House is in favor of not taking a census of the Panama Canal Zone by the Census Bureau.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion? I may have said I was not personally insistent about this. I am one citizen out of about 80,000,000 in this country, and I have no special interest in any census at all. It is a question for the Committee of the Whole to determine, a question of national policy, and should be determined from that standpoint. I have no personal ambition to see any amendment I may propose or any provision I may be responsible for kept in the bill.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I did not misunderstand the gentleman. I understood him to say that before, and he explained how it got in. I think nearly every man here would be willing to have it stricken out. I think it ought to be done in the first place, and then we can consider the amendemnt. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment that the last five words be stricken out, "and the Panama Canal Zone."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I doubt if that amendment is now in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not now in order, but will be in order later.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, will it be in order now to ask that the amendment be divided?

The CHAIRMAN. It will be in order.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Then I make that request.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, when this matter first came up I felt as did the gentleman from Minnesota, that there ought to be no census of the Panama Canal Zone or these islands in the Pacific Ocean. But my knowledge is that there are several propositions pending in the House in reference to Samoa and Tutuila and the island of Guam, where we are asked to expend money in different directions and where we are absolutely without information; and, while it seems to me that there ought not to be a census taken under the provisions of this bill, which will be exceedingly expensive, it does seem to me that if we shall provide that the Secretary of the Navy take the census of the islands under regulations he may prescribe, it will be done practically without any expense to the Government, and be published along with the rest of the information, so that it will be available.

Now, as to the Panama Canal Zone, the Isthmian Canal Commission could easily take a census of the Zone. The gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from Ohio have stated that all the Americans upon the Canal Zone are in the employ of the Isthmian Canal Commission, but there is some error in that. There are a number of people down there who are American citizens who are not in the employment of the Government at all. There are a great many other people in the Canal Zone who are practically under our Government and our jurisdiction, not in the employ of the Canal Commission. It is estimated that there are 75,000 to 100,000 citizens in the Canal Zone proper, the most of them farmers, some of them gardeners, many merchants, and various sorts of employment. They are engaged in all kinds of pursuits, and it seems to me that it would be advisable for us to know, both here and in the Zone, the number of those people and their occupation.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. Is it not probable that the merchants in the cities of Panama and Colon, who are not included in the Canal Zone except for certain purposes, would not be included in this census?

Mr. MANN. It is true that there are a large number of merchants in the Canal Zone, but they are not all in the cities of Panama and Colon. The Canal Zone is about 42 miles long. There is a town every few miles, some places only a mile or a mile and a half apart. These towns are being shifted. It is true that many more will be shifted when the lake is created. We own a large share of this property, and the information which we would get by the census would be valuable to Congress in considering questions relating to the Zone. For instance, we have no permanent government for the Canal Zone. Congress a few years ago provided that until the expiration of that Congress the President should govern the Zone. That Congress expired without additional legislation, and the President found himself in a position where he had a government de facto in existence without any authority of law except the authority that he was President of the United States. He could not permit anarchy to take place and therefore he has continued the government of the Zone. The question as to his right and how far his right goes has not been settled; and we have pending before the Committee on Commerce now bills in relation to the government of the Canal Zone. It would be of distinct advantage to Congress in the consideration of those bills to finally erect a government of the Canal Zone to know something of the character of the people and their occupation in the Canal Zone.

Now, I would suggest that if we could have this taken, this census under the Isthmian Canal Commission, with the force which they have there, the regulations which the Secretary of War or the Isthmian Canal Commission might prescribe, it would be a matter of small expense and might be and would be a matter of considerable benefit.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the gentleman in his time that I have another amendment prepared to offer in the way of a proviso authorizing the President of the United States to direct the enumerations and inquiries required by the bill for the decennial census, to be made by the Secretary of War for the Isthmus of Panama, and by the Secretary of the Navy for the other islands. That will put all the question of inquiries and enumerations under the control of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy in cooperation with the Director of the Census, expecting, of course, that he will consult with them in regard to schedules and so on.

Mr. MANN. Would that give the President authority to say what examination, and so forth, should be made down there? In other words, would the census taken in the first place, under the gentleman's amendment, have to be taken with supervisors and enumerators and all the other minutiæ of this bill?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No; because the amendment I shall offer authorizes the President to require the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to take the enumerations and the inquiries, upon the theory that when these enumerations and inquiries shall have been completed they will be sent to the Census Office here for tabulation, compilation, and publication.

Mr. MANN. I would suggest to the gentleman, where he says the Secretary of War, that, in my judgment, it would be more advisable to say the Isthmian Canal Commission. The President, it is true, has turned the Isthmian Canal Commission for the present over to the War Department, but it is also true that to-morrow he may turn it over to the State Department or take it from any other Department, because that is a matter wholly within his discretion, and the Isthmian Canal Commission are really the people who are at present in control. Of course, what they do under the President's order they are required to do under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. A division has been asked as to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana. The Clerk will report the first part of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "the Territories of" in line 9, page 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to renew my motion to strike out the last five words of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. There are two other amendments pending. The Clerk will report the next division of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "and" after the word "Hawaii" in line 9, page 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next division of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "Samoa" in line 9, and insert "and other islands in the Pacific Ocean, except the Philippine Islands."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. That disposes of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I now ask for a vote on the amendment which I offered, to strike out all of line 10, as amended.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Then that will include my amendment?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. That is all right.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, line 10 has been changed now.

Mr. TAWNEY. As amended. That would strike out Guam, Samoa, and all the Pacific Islands under the jurisdiction of the United States, including the Isthmian Canal Commission. I withdraw the former amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Then let this amendment be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of line 10 as amended.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I think we ought to have it read now as it is proposed to be amended by this amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I would ask that the paragraph be reported as it would read with the amendment adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the paragraph as it would read if the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota were adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of line 10 as amended, so that the paragraph beginning with line 6 will read:

"The census herein provided for shall include each State and Territory on the mainland of the United States, the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and on a division, demanded by Mr. CRUMPACKER, there were—ayes 36, noes 20.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. CRUMPACKER and Mr. TAWNEY were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 36.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] The Chair counts 107 Members present; a quorum is present, and the amendment is agreed to. The Chair suggests that the word "and" should be added here before the words "Porto Rico."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The committee has already struck that out, and I think it ought to go back, and I ask unaniomus consent that it be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that that provision of this bill shall be read, as it has already been amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the provision as amended.

The Clerk again reported the provision as amended.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after the word "manufactures," in line 3, the words "timber lands."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order upon the amendment.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, I am sure I can not see how it can be subject to a point of order. We are seeking to enact a statute here, and Congress certainly has the right to pass any kind of a law it desires. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is a very important matter——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have a decision on the point of order. Is the gentleman debating the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I would like to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I would like to have a ruling on the point of order before the merits of the amendment are discussed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will state his point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the point of order is this: The bill is reported here as a privileged bill in the House, having been referred to the Committee on the Census. Of course I am not sure about the point of order. I am sure about this, the amendment offered by the gentleman is not a privileged matter. Whether he can hang language to the bill that is already before the committee I do not feel perfectly confident about, but this matter does not come into the House as privileged under the rules of the House. It comes into the House privileged only because it affects the membership of the House in the reapportionment of the membership under the Constitution, with which a census of the timber lands has not a thing to do.

Mr. DRISCOLL. How about quarries?

Mr. MANN. These things are in the bill as reported from the committee and they are not subject to the point of order. I do not know about the other, but I think it is possible they are not, because the bill being considered is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me it is not worth while for this House to debate the question whether this amendment is subject to a point of order. This committee has brought this bill before the House. It is a statute that is sought to be enacted, and whether the amendment is privileged or not is immaterial.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order. The bill is here; whether it is privileged or not was a question for the House when it went into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say just a word in regard to my amendment, and only one word. It seems to me the question of taking a census of the timber lands of the United States is just as important as to take a census of the manufactures, of our mines and mining, or of agriculture. The division known as the Forestry Bureau, in the Agricultural Department, is very much interested in conserving the forests——

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from Nebraska permit an interruption?

Mr. POLLARD. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to ask, for information, if it is not a fact that the Committee on Agriculture has now pending before it, submitted by the Bureau of Forestry, a proposition for taking a timber census of the United States?

Mr. POLLARD. If that is true, it has not come to my attention and the committee has not taken it up.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have been informed it was there, or was going to be submitted, and the estimated cost was $3,000,000.

Mr. POLLARD. Well, I am not prepared to say anything about that. There may be such a bill before the Committee on Agriculture. If there is, it has not yet come before the committee and has not been brought to the attention of Members.

The question of the preservation of our forests and our timber lands is one of the most important questions before the American people to-day. It seems to me that it is extremely important that we should know the extent of these forests and the amount of timber that is growing thereon. And I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. POLLARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BENNET of New York. What is the attitude of the Forestry Bureau in regard to your amendment?

Mr. POLLARD. The Forestry Bureau is very anxious to have the census made of the timber lands of the United States.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is not the Forestry Bureau taking some census now?

Mr. POLLARD. There is no census being taken by the Department of Agriculture at the present time.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There are two bills pending now before the Committee on the Census providing for a census of the acreage of standing timber and the stumpage. The Chief of the Forestry Bureau, Mr. Pinchot, was before the committee and explained the proposition. He said he did not want that census included in the decennial census bill. If he had insisted that it should be there, I am satisfied the Committee on the Census would not have recommended it. It is an important subject, but the Committee on the Census has not given it any special consideration, although there was one day devoted to the hearings on that question.

Now, this bill, Mr. Chairman, is a decennial census bill, including four principal inquiries and the time within which these inquiries shall be completed and the report published is fixed. If we include forestry and numerous other subjects that might be proposed, it would be impossible to do the work within the time limit. The Census Office will have everything it can do to get through the four principal investigations and tabulate and publish the reports by the first day of July, 1912, the time fixed in the bill. The census of timber acreage and stumpage, if it is ordered at all, should be one of the special investigations to be made by the Census Bureau in cooperation with the Forestry Bureau. The Chief of the Bureau of Forestry said that all he wanted was a census of timber lands and stumpage outside of the forest reservations. He said he already had power enough to get acreage and the quantity of merchantable timber in the forest reservations. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will vote down the amendment.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have just one further word on the amendment. The gentleman concedes that this is a very important matter and that this census ought to be taken. His only objection to it is that it ought not to be in this bill; that this bill seeks to reach four, and four only, great subjects.

Now, then, he seeks to reach the same object by creating a new staff of men. I submit that the men who are taking the census of agriculture and of mines and quarries, can just as well include our forests as to have a separate organization—a new lot of men to do this work, which would unquestionably cost more money than it would if it were conducted at the same time the regular census is being taken.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The chief of the Bureau of Forestry did not ask to have the census of forests included in this bill, because he wanted it earlier. He wants a special investigation of that subject during this year, and that is one of the questions that the Committee on the Census has to determine in the near future. Mr. Pinchot objected to having this proposition put into this bill, as a matter, not of administration, but as a matter of time. He wants it before he could get it under this bill; and the committee would not have included it in this bill, because there is already included here all the work that can be done within the time limit.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, undoubtedly the census of the standing timber in this country would be very important and very useful. It would apprise the present owners of timber land how much remaining timber there was that might be bought by them, or it would enable them to fix the price upon that which they own. There are many reasons why it would be desirable to the holders of timber lands as well as to consumers of lumber. But, Mr. Chairman, we have already heard from the chairman of the Census Committee that the Department of Agriculture is making some investigation of this subject and desires to make more, and I happen to know, as a matter of personal knowledge, that the Department of Commerce and Labor is at the present time making a special investigation—I do not know whether you might call it a census or not—for the purpose of ascertaining the acreage of timber land in this country, the names of the owners, with the acreage and the stumpage, etc. They are making a pretty exhaustive examination and census. It seems to me that we do not require three different Departments of the Government investigating the same subject at the same time and at triple expense to the United States Treasury.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that this proposition will probably come before the House later, I want to supplement what the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said, that the chief beneficiaries of a census of the standing timber of the United States will be the lumbermen or prospective investors in standing timber. To take this proposed timber census would save them the expense of "cruising" the tracts of timber land which they may contemplate purchasing. This work is expensive. In fact, it is the most expensive incident connected with the purchase of standing timber, and is information the lumberman must have, and if he can induce——

Mr. POLLARD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. POLLARD. Would not the same objection apply also to making a census of mines and forests?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it would not. But that proposition is not now before the House. The policy of what shall be included in the census has been established long before this.

This is a new proposition, and if it is adopted, either now or hereafter, will be chiefly and solely for the benefit of the lumbermen of the United States, or those who may desire to purchase the remaining standing timber. Why, the lumbermen of this country, wherever there is a tract of pine that is available for purchase, are sending their "cruisers" out. They must know before they purchase what the character of the timber is, as well as the amount of the acreage and amount of the stumpage; they must know the streams and the topography of the country; they must have a complete estimate and a reliable estimate, and they know a more reliable estimate could not be obtained than that made by the Government. Why, Mr. Chairman, it would take five years to take a census of the standing timber, unless you employed an army of "cruisers" and sent them out in the standing timber of the United States for that purpose. I sincerely hope this amendment will not prevail, and that no proposition like it will prevail hereafter.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, when this proposition first came before the Committee on the Census, of which I am a member—that a census of the standing timber should be taken—I must confess that at first I was disposed to favor it; but, on reflection, as the gentleman from Minnesota has well said, after I began to receive—and I presume every member of the Census Committee received the same thing, and probably each Member of this House—petitions from wholesale lumbermen all over the United States favoring a census of the stumpage of standing timber of the United States, I began to doubt the advisability of it, because, as the gentleman from Minnesota well says, if the census of the standing timber of the United States is taken by the Government, the stamp of approval would be put upon that census by the Government of the United States, and purchasers of standing timber would know it is reliable. It strikes me, Mr. Chairman, very forcibly that this is simply an attempt on the part of the large lumbermen to locate the standing timber of the United States and buy it up. For that reason I am opposed to the amendment, and I am opposed to taking a census of the standing timber of the United States. Now, Mr. Chairman, the statement was made in the committee hearings before the Census Committee that if a census was taken of the standing timber of the United States it would increase the cost of lumber; but there was not one word, Mr. Chairman, that it would increase the price of the standing timber of the United States. Therefore I do not think, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's amendment should obtain. I am opposed to it, and I hope the committee will vote it down.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this amendment be closed in five minutes. That will give the gentleman from Massachusetts five minutes.

The question was taken and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Chairman, what subjects should be included in the taking of the census of the United States should be dependent upon the importance of the subjects themselves, and if a subject has arisen since the last census was taken that has become of paramount importance, then that should be included; I consider that the matter which has been brought to our attention by the gentleman offering this amendment is one of that sort, because now there is among the people absolute ignorance as to how fast our lumber resources are being denuded. Go down to the State of Maine and examine the thousands of miles of timber and ask those who are supposed to be conversant with the subject, and some will tell you that the forests of Maine are not being depleted, that they are cut upon regular rules and regulations, and the supply will be, for many years and generations to come, equal to the demand.

Others will controvert that statement. This shows that there has been no real compilation of the facts in the case.

Now, inasmuch as it must be admitted that this subject is of infinite importance to the commercial development of this country, on account of the enormous demand for lumber, both for building purposes and the manufacture of paper, there should be some knowledge given to the people of this country, which can only be attained by a census being taken, in order that we may know whether to vote for our great forest reservations, which are being presented for the consideration of Congress, and other matters appertaining to this subject.

How is it that Sweden, Norway, and Germany are able, after centuries, still to preserve their forests and have a supply for building purposes and for the manufacture of pulp and paper? It is because they know just how many trees are cut down in those countries and what their supply is, and because of that knowledge they have enacted laws by which the owners of the land are obligated to plant a tree for every one that is cut down. This supply will probably be equal to the demand for generations to come. And inasmuch as our forests are, as it were, being literally swept from the earth, and the price of lumber and pulp wood is going up at such an extraordinary rate from year to year, and as the people of the whole country are almost as much interested in this as they are in the necessaries of life, I say that we are negligent of our duty not to incorporate into this law some provision by which some knowledge at least of this subject shall be obtained. It will not be necessary that every tree should be counted or that every stump should be marked, but there should at least be something done in this direction, so that we may have some knowledge in reference to this most important matter.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think the gentleman misapprehends the status of his proposition. All such inquiries as a census of the timber of the country are what we call special inquiries, to be taken up during the interim between the decennial censuses. We take a decennial census of four important subjects, and we fix a time limit within which that undertaking shall be completed. The balance of the time the Census Office is employed in making special inquiries, and a census of the timber of the United States would be classed as one of those inquiries. The Chief of the Bureau of Forestry suggested that this subject be left out of this bill, but that it be included in the special inquiries that the Census Bureau is to make during the interim between the decennial censuses.

Mr. TIRRELL. I wondered why the gentleman had not made some provision for a census of this kind. If it is to be taken in the intervening years, immediately after the census of population is taken, of course the main object will be accomplished.

Mr. POLLARD. Did I understand the gentleman to say that Mr. Pinchot made the statement before the committee that he did not want this subject included in this bill?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; in effect.

Mr. POLLARD. I wish to say that he stated just the opposite in my committee. I understand the gentleman to say that this subject will be considered by the Census Bureau in the interim between the taking of the decennial censuses.

Mr. HAYES. I make the point of order that the time for debate on this has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate has expired. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I should like to have the amendment reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "manufactures," in line 3, insert the words "timber lands."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 6, page 1, the words "and once every ten years thereafter."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, page 1, strike out the words "and once every ten years thereafter."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, this involves the question whether we are going to adopt a permanent census law under which the Thirteenth Census shall be taken and all future decennial censuses.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to inquire if we have not a permanent census law now?

Mr. TAWNEY. We have what is claimed to be a permanent law. I was going to say that that very fact is one reason why we should not attempt to make this a permanent law, but merely enact a law covering the taking of the Thirteenth Census. We have two permanent census laws. We have a law creating a permanent Census Bureau with specific powers.

My principal objection, Mr. Chairman, to this, however, is the fact—and this is the distinction between the proposed permanent law and the one we now have—the present permanent census law does not enlarge the scope of the activities of the Census Bureau, as defined in the law making that Bureau a permanent census organization, while this law, or proposed law, will add materially to the functions of our permanent Census Bureau. I do not believe that this House is justified in enlarging the field of the activities of the Census Bureau in this or in any other bill.

There are several particulars in which, if this provision remains in the bill and the bill becomes a law, the Census Bureau will have added to its present functions many things it has no authority to do now, and where it will require a vast sum of money annually to enable the Census Bureau to do the additional work thus imposed by this proposed permanent act.

In the first place, we have a quinquennial census of agriculture, a census taken every five years. We have at the present time a law which authorizes the Census Bureau to take a census every year of the cotton statistics. It is now proposed to have a complete agricultural census every five years instead of every ten years, as heretofore, and have that agricultural census include everything imaginable in regard to the agricultural industries.

It was stated yesterday by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] that the estimated cost of this agricultural census, taken every five years, will be $2,000,000, which estimate, it is fair to assume, will not cover much more, if any more, than one-half of the cost of taking that census.

It is therefore not only proposed to greatly enlarge the field of activity of the Census Bureau, but also to greatly enlarge the permanent annual cost of maintaining that Bureau.

In addition to that, I find upon reading the bill, that, in section 18, it is proposed to give to the Director of the Census the power of appointing any number of special agents under this act and under the act creating the permanent Census Bureau, and all acts amendatory thereof. These special agents are to be employed in connection with the taking of the Thirteenth Census. Their employment, if authorized, may continue indefinitely under the permanent census act. Their per diem compensation is fixed at not more than $6 a day and traveling expenses added and subsistence at $4 a day.

Gentleman will see that there are a great many provisions here that will become permanent law on the Census Bureau, creating new functions and conferring new authority, which will hereafter be made the basis for additional appropriations.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the force of the gentleman's argument is not directed to his amendment at all. We have now a permanent census law, and if this bill is not enacted at all the Census Office can take the Thirteenth Census under that law. It would take the general census, including the vital statistics, a subject that is now covered by the annual investigation of that subject which the law requires the permanent office to make.

So it occurs to me that the criticism the gentleman makes of the permanent character of the law that this bill foreshadows is without much, if any, force. There is just as much to be accomplished in having permanency in a census law that undertakes to create a general and harmonious system for collecting statistics as in any other law. It has been the policy of the Government for several decades to write each one of its census laws in permanent form. The act providing for the Twelfth Census provides for that census and all subsequent censuses. Since that act was passed we have created a permanent Census Office, and conditions have changed somewhat, and this bill undertakes to coordinate the decennial-census scheme with the permanent-census law. It is deemed highly important for that purpose.

Now, the question as to the additional powers that are conferred upon the permanent Census Office I will say may be met by stating that they will not be conferred upon the permanent Census Office unless the Committee of the Whole House and Congress shall think fit. Those questions will be met when we reach them in the reading of the bill. The gentleman can then make his motion to strike out the quinquennial census of agriculture if he chooses to do so. The gentleman was not entirely frank in stating the scope of that provision anyway. He says it includes the census of every imaginable thing that is connected with the industry of agriculture. Mr. Chairman, if he will read the section of the bill providing for it he will discover that it is a limited census of agriculture; that it covers simply the acreage of farm lands, the acreage of principal crops, and the live stock on the farms and ranges.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does not the decennial census give that same information?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; and much more. It includes the live stock on farms and ranges and everywhere else. It covers the entire subject. I refer to the provision the gentleman has discussed to show that it is a circumscribed and a limited census of agriculture and live stock in relation to the industry of agriculture.

Mr. HACKNEY. If the contention of the gentleman is correct, I would like to ask the necessity for these words sought to be stricken out. Would the bill be emasculated if the words were stricken out?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It would not.

Mr. HACKNEY. Then what is the necessity for putting those words in?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We are enacting a law now that supersedes the existing law, because since that law was enacted we have created a permanent Census Office, and we want a law that will be in perfect harmony with that, so that the two taken together will constitute a systematic and harmonious whole. That is the main object of this bill, and if the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] shall be adopted it will not affect the question until ten years comes about. It will not affect the census—the Thirteenth Census—at all, but we think this bill provides a good and wise scheme for taking the decennial census and that it ought to be made permanent, so that the Census Office will know and shape its interdecennial work to meet the decennial period.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. DRISCOLL. The law of 1899 provided for the Twelfth Census and a census every ten years thereafter.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It did.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Then the law of 1902, of March 6, provided for a permanent census.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes, for a permanent Census Office.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Now, section 6 of that law provides that all the provisions of the act of March 3, 1899, relating to the Twelfth Census not inconsistent with the provisions of that act should remain in full force and effect for the taking of the Thirteenth and subsequent censuses.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. And therefore the law passed in 1902 provided for the permanency of the former census.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. And it also amends several sections of the law of 1899.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It does.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Now, this bill provides that the law of 1902 shall remain in force.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Which bill?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Your bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, no.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Except as amended by this bill, and that is not amended. Will it not still remain in force?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It will not. In the first place, this law covers the whole field, and if there was no repealing clause in the bill the original law would be repealed by necessary implication. That is a plain proposition.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Does not the gentleman think we get into a lot of complications if we have two permanent laws?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We will not, because we can not have two permanent laws upon the same subject. We say the permanent law shall not be repealed except in so far as it may be inconsistent with this.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will we not avoid a lot of civil-service complications and a lot of other matters if we let this law expire in three years?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No, I think not; but these questions I can not go into in detail. The Committee on the Census obtained the best information on this subject that it could. It consulted men in the best situation to know—men who had experience in relation to the matters—and after a number of weeks of hearings and consultation among themselves, and obtaining a lot of information which would take some little time to give to the committee, they reached the conclusion this was a wise thing to do. If the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union thinks that it is better prepared to make a bill, it has the power to do it. We believe that this clause should remain in the bill.

Mr. BURLESON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is it not a fact the censuses of 1860 and 1870 were both taken under the act of 1850?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think that is true.

Mr. BURLESON. And is it not also a fact that the censuses of 1890 and 1900, the act under which those censuses were taken, became a law on the 3d day of March, and both of them came very near failing of passage in the House?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; that is true, indeed.

Mr. BURLESON. And if in ten years anything should happen and we did not reenact a census act, there would be no law upon the statute book to take the census.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to submit a proposition—that is a good observation—every law that we have had for fifty years has been a permanent law in its character. It has been the policy of Congress for more than fifty years to make all of these laws permanent, and I do not see any reason for changing now. Now, as to the criticism about the appointment of special agents. That provision is substantially as it was in the Twelfth Census act. When we get to that section, if the Committee of the Whole thinks it ought to be amended, it has the power to amend it. If the gentleman from Minnesota has objections to it, he will doubtless be here to make them; and if he can convince the committee they are right, they will go out. If they are right for the Thirteenth Census, why are they not right for the permanent census?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the point I make in regard to that is that these special agents that are to be appointed are not alone appointed under the act authorizing the taking of the Thirteenth Census, but they are appointed and to serve under the law which establishes the permanent Census Bureau. It makes them permanent employees in the Census Department, and not temporary for the purpose of taking the Thirteenth Census.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We can discuss that question when we meet it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, while I am on the floor, Mr. Chairman, I want to make this observation in answer to the gentleman from Indiana. The very fact that our permanent census law, under which the Twelfth Census was taken, is not now deemed adequate and sufficient for the taking of the Thirteenth Census is very good evidence of the fact that the proposed permanent census law which we are now considering will not be sufficient to meet the changed conditions that may arise between now and 1920, the time for the taking of the Fourteenth Census. I think that, when there is a specific service to be performed once every decade, it is absolutely impossible for Congress to know the exact conditions under which that service will have to be performed. The service is temporary, and the act under which the service is performed should also be temporary and logical. I do not think there is any necessity for making it permanent, and we do avoid, by striking this out, the possibility of enlarging the scope of our permanent Census Bureau.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I understand debate is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I make the point of order that debate is exhausted on this amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I want to be orthodox in this debate.

Mr. KEIFER. The chairman of the Committee on the Census from Indiana is entirely right in wanting us all to be orthodox in this debate. I am trying to help him and I may not live long enough, if this system of legislature goes on, to reach a time when we will get through this matter of passing bills to establish a plan of making a permanent census. I think this will make the fifth act that has been passed for establishing a permanent census and to conduct it.

This bill illustrates the danger of having a great many acts on the same subject without anybody knowing how much they are in conflict with one another, and without, as is proved, any one of them being sufficient to accomplish the end desired. We find we had an act passed on March 3, 1899, entitled "An act to provide for taking the Twelfth and subsequent censuses." Then we have an act passed on March 6, 1902, entitled "An act to provide for a permanent Census Office," and taking the census. And then another act was passed on February 14, 1903, entitled "An act to establish a Department of Commerce and Labor," that has something to do with the census. Then we have an act passed June 7, 1906, "To amend section 7 of an act entitled 'An act to provide for a permanent Census Office.'" Now, we find that in this clause that it is proposed to amend it is said that: "This shall provide for the taking of the census of the year 1910, and once every ten years thereafter." What becomes of the permanent act or acts? What becomes of the other provisions for taking the census? If this bill is to become permanent law, if it is passed through this Congress, what becomes of it?

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], who is always quite at himself, says that it is to be permanent law and that it does not repeal any other law, except, perhaps, where there is a conflict, but he is unable to state now, or anybody else, where the conflict will come in, because the acts we already have are not sufficient to take the Thirteenth Census. I will read, so as to be entirely fair about it. This little bill that is to become permanent law covers twenty-five pages, and it has thirty-three sections. Section 33 reads:

> That the act establishing the permanent Census Office, approved March 6, 1902, and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, except as herein amended, shall remain in full force.

There is not any specific proposition to amend other acts on the subject. What is meant by this bill where it is in conflict with the other permanent acts nobody now knows.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. KEIFER. I will in a moment. I will read further, as follows:

> That the act entitled "An act to provide for taking the Twelfth and subsequent censuses," approved March 3, 1899, and all other laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

Now, what was it that the gentleman wanted to suggest?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I wanted to suggest to the gentleman that the last section continues in force the permanent census law except as amended in this bill. It is amended in a few particulars by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. KEIFER. I have just read what section 33 states on that subject. But we have a confusion of bills and laws, and we ought at least to take up, codify, and pass a permanent census law, and not undertake to patch the old ones or undertake to pass a bill that is inconsistent with the old, and leave somebody to find out what the law is by reading all of them together—what parts of existing acts are repealed by implication.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I understood the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] to say that the last act for the Twelfth Census provided for the taking of subsequent censuses.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It says so.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have a very great deal of confidence in the ability of the gentleman from Indiana. I know of no man in the House who is more devoted to the duties of his office and more capable in the performance of his duties than the chairman of the Census Committee. [Applause.] I think, on the whole, the bill that he has brought in this time is probably the best census bill which has ever been reported in the House. In saying this I say it with full appreciation of the fact that it is a difficult matter to prepare a bill providing for the taking of the census, and it requires great care and consideration. That care and consideration has been given to the bill by the gentleman from Indiana and by the Census Committee, and yet, Mr. Chairman, I am of the opinion that when the gentleman from Indiana and the Census Committee and all the balance of this House have passed away all wisdom will not die with them. The gentleman from Indiana must be familiar with the law providing for the taking of the Twelfth Census, and he cites us to the statement that it provided for taking not only the Twelfth but subsequent censuses. Mr. Chairman, I have always been of the opinion that, in order to know what a law meant and said, it was necessary to read beyond the title. The title of the law for the taking of the Twelfth Census was "An act to provide for the taking of the Twelfth and subsequent censuses," but there is not a line in the law in references to the taking of subsequent censuses.

The first section of that act provides that "it shall be the duty of the chief officer, whoever he may be, to superintend and direct the taking of the Twelfth Census of the United States in accordance with the laws relating thereto, and to perform such other duties as may be required of him by law;" and at the end of that same section is this provision:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to establish a census bureau permanent beyond the Twelfth Census.

Mr. KEIFER. Well, Mr. Chairman, will not the gentleman allow me to request him to read the first section of the bill which he is now reading? It is very short; only two or three lines.

Mr. MANN. Very true; but the provision of the act provides that it shall not apply to the taking of any census after the Twelfth Census.

Mr. KEIFER. But the first section provides that the census shall be taken in the year 1900, and every ten years thereafter.

Mr. MANN. The Constitution provides that. That is just a repetition of the Constitution. The Constitution provides for the taking of the census; but this bill provides for an entirely different thing.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest to him these two things——

Mr. MANN. Now, there is not a line—permit me to make that statement. The gentleman from Ohio is usually extremely careful in matters of this kind. There is not a line that I find in the first section or any other place in the law—beyond the Twelfth Census alone—which provides a method of taking any census beyond the Twelfth Census.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, I think, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit an interruption—and if the gentleman needs more time I will get it for him—the first section of the bill, as said by the gentleman from Ohio, provides for the taking of the Twelfth Census, that it shall be taken how, by inference under some previous act, and once in every ten years thereafter; and the clause quoted by the gentleman from Illinois, "That nothing herein contained shall be construed to establish a census bureau beyond the Twelfth Census," is altogether a different proposition. The Congress was careful not to provide for a permanent Census Office in this bill, but the census could be taken according to the provisions of the bill in 1900 and every ten years thereafter. The Bureau, not being permanent, went out of existence after taking one census, and being created again for the next census; and the Director of the Census has taken the opinion of the Attorney-General upon that subject, and says in his report, or at least he said before the committee, that he had the power to take this census under the provisions of the act of 1889.

Mr. LANGLEY. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him; I am familiar with the legislative history of the bill, and I remember that this provision he refers to, providing that there should be no permanent Census Office beyond the completion of the Twelfth Census work, was inserted in the Senate. At that time there appeared, as the debate shows, to have been some fear entertained that an attempt would be made to string out the work indefinitely, as had occurred before. Hence that limitation was put in. There was no question raised then about the act applying to future decennial censuses.

Mr. MANN. The first part of the statement of the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky does not jibe with the last half of his statement. It is true the provision was inserted in the Senate, for the purpose of preventing this act applying to any census subsequent to the Twelfth Census.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask that I may have five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I want to be perfectly fair to the gentleman from Indiana and the Census Committee. The act for the taking of the Twelfth Census provides not for the taking of the census in the first section at all, but quotes the Constitution, and provides that a census shall be taken. It added nothing to the value of the Constitution to insert it in the act, but the act itself provides that so far as the taking of the census is concerned, it should not apply beyond the Twelfth Census.

Now, this bill is intended to and covers another and different proposition. The bill we have before us provides for the taking not of the census provided by the Constitution; provides not for a census of the population, that being provided by the Constitution, but provides also of agriculture, manufactures, mining, and quarries, which are not constitutional provisions, in regard to the census, and then goes on to provide that these subsequent censuses shall be taken in accordance with the provisions of this law.

Before this bill was reported to this House and after the gentleman from Indiana had introduced his first bill in reference to the subject of taking the census, the Director of the Census and the Secretary of the Interior appointed an advisory committee of men who have been distinguished experts in census matters to make a report upon the bill.

I was rather surprised that the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] did not refer to the report of this advisory committee in his speech yesterday; but after I had read the report of the advisory committee myself I was not surprised that he did not refer to it, because I think that the Committee on the Census have not followed a single recommendation of the advisory committee; or perhaps they have followed a single recommendation; but the advisory committee recommended the striking out of this provision for every subsequent census.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let me correct the gentleman. That is in reference to the census for the Philippine Islands.

Mr. MANN. That may be. I am not familiar with the first bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is a fact.

Mr. MANN. The recommendation of the advisory committee does not show. Of course I take the gentleman's word for that.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That refers to the first section of the bill.

Mr. MANN. What object is there in providing now for the taking of the census ten years from 1910? Does the gentleman suppose that Congress will not have the ability at that time, with the information which will then be before it, to provide for taking that census? I can see but one object in putting into this law a provision for taking the census hereafter, and that is to fasten upon the Government and the Census Office the spoils system of appointments in the first instance, and providing for an extremely costly method of taking the census in the second instance. Congress can determine the matter upon the facts which are then before them. We do not take the census now as they did in 1860. They did not take the census in 1870 as they did in 1860, nor in 1880 as they did in 1870. The census of 1900 was different from the census of 1890, and the one of 1890 was very different from the one of 1880. The one for 1910 is to be different from the one for 1900. Why should we endeavor to say that we know so much about the condition of the country ten years from now that we are better able to legislate now for something which is purely temporary and local then than the Congress will be at that time? What excuse can be given for the endeavor to fasten upon the Government a law which will have to be changed or repealed, in all likelihood, and which if not changed or repealed will not answer the purpose of the census at that time?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, just a word in reply. I repeat that three censuses in the history of this country have been taken under a single law. I believe we have made a great deal of progress in the work of gathering statistics in the last twenty-five or thirty years. We have a permanent Census Office now, and we have the collection of census statistics reduced practically to a science. We have now provisions covering almost every subject of inquiry that is regarded as of any degree of importance, and our law provides that many of those inquiries shall be taken during the interims between the decennial censuses; and the bill, if enacted into law, covers but four important questions. It embodies many of the provisions of the law of 1899, but I repeat that it is the judgment of those best advised, those who know most about the administration of the Census Office, who know most about the traditions and the customs in the Office respecting its temporary and its periodical work, that the present bill is one adapted to permanent uses, and the Director of the Census and the commissions selected by the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor recommend the enactment of this bill, with the permanent provision as one of its chief features.

I can see no kind of reason why it should not be made permanent. If conditions shall so change within the next ten years that amendments shall be deemed proper, the amendments can readily be made. Now, it will take possibly a month of the time of this Congress to pass this bill, according to the present rate of progress. It will cost the country many thousands of dollars while the House is haggling over questions of this character, some of them important and some perhaps not; but I repeat that it has cost the Government no more to make the Office permanent than it would to make it only temporary, and it will cost no more to make the work permanent than it will to make it only temporary. There will then be harmony and system in census laws. I insist that the laws, ever since 1800, have been permanent in their character, and we will avoid ten years from now the labor and expense that the Government will have to bear of passing a new census law. Now, we need a new bill at this time, as I have explained, and I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say one word in closing the debate on the amendment. We are considering this proposition of a permanent census law under entirely different circumstances and conditions from that which has obtained heretofore when the House considered previous census laws for the taking of previous censuses. Then we had no permanent Census Bureau. We knew when we were considering and acting upon the law under which the Twelfth Census was taken that when that census was taken and completed the law would expire or become inoperative until the time arrived to take the Thirteenth Census. But since that law has been enacted Congress established a permanent Census Bureau, and in doing so was influenced by the representations then made that, in consequence of having a permanent Census Bureau, the cost of taking the Thirteenth Census would be greatly reduced because then we would have all the machinery in working order to begin several years in advance of the time of taking this census.

Now, it is proposed to establish or enact a law under which the Thirteenth Census shall be taken in 1910 and under which the census in 1920 shall be taken. But the gentleman from Indiana must not overlook the fact that in attempting to enact this permanent law we are also asked to materially enlarge the functions of our permanent organization for the taking of the census, and that, too, in a bill which, in effect, is only temporary. I do not care what the language of the act may be; he may provide for the taking of future censuses, but in effect the act will be merely temporary for the reason that this Congress can not anticipate what the conditions may be when we come to take the census in 1920, nor whether or not our action to-day will appeal to the judgment and common sense of the Congress then in session.

We must bear in mind the fact that we are enacting a temporary law therefor, that we are enacting a law that affects a permanent institution without our knowing the extent to which that institution is to be affected or the extent to which we are now authorizing it to create obligations against the Government which must be paid in the future, and for that reason I say the law ought simply to provide for taking the Thirteenth Census and leave the work of the permanent Census Bureau to be done under the act creating that Bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. TAWNEY) there were—ayes 37, noes 29.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The Chair appointed as tellers Mr. CRUMPACKER of Indiana and Mr. TAWNEY of Minnesota.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 41, noes 52.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out, in line 6, page 1, the word "one." I believe it will make the bill more definite.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "one."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That after June 30, 1909, there may be employed in the Census Office, in addition to the force provided for by the act of March 6, 1902, entitled "An act to provide for a permanent Census Office," an Assistant Director, who shall be an experienced, practical statistician; a chief statistician, who shall be a person of known and tried experience in statistical work; an appointment clerk; a private secretary to the Director; two stenographers; and eight expert chiefs of division. These officers, with the exception of the Assistant Director, shall be appointed without examination by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor upon the recommendation of the Director of the Census. The Assistant Director shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. HACKNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, as follows:

On page 2, line 2, after the word "nine," insert the words "and during the decennial census period only."

I think, Mr. Chairman, that carries out the idea of the gentleman from Indiana. In section 3 it is provided for the appointment of an extra force, but I do not see anywhere in the bill any limitation on the term of office of that extra force. It is to carry out that idea that I offer the amendment.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have no objection to that, because it is clearly the intention of the bill. I think it is provided for, however, in a subsequent section.

Mr. HACKNEY. I did not find it.

The question was considered, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 2, line 11, by striking out the words "without examination."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 11, strike out the words "without examination."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this provides for the appointment of a number of persons in the Office, including stenographers, without examination, and while I am inclined myself to be with the committee and with the gentleman from Indiana that the census employees ought not to be compelled to take a civil-service competitive examination for appointment in temporary places only, I can not quite see what argument there is in favor of excepting the principal places in the Office and making them merely political appointments under the spoils system.

If stenographers are to be paid the enormous sum of $2,000 apiece for being stenographers, they ought to be required to be stenographers. Under this provision they can appoint anybody as a stenographer if he goes on the pay roll as a stenographer, and he does not need to know a sign from a letter.

Mr. LANGLEY. Does the gentleman think that the Director of the Census would make an appointment of that kind where the law provides that the appointee shall be a stenographer?

Mr. MANN. Why, the gentleman from Kentucky is aware of the fact that all through the pay rolls of the Government men are filling offices which are called such and such positions, even requiring expert knowledge, when the appointee has no knowledge on the subject whatever.

Mr. LANGLEY. And appointed under that designation?

Mr. MANN. Transferred by the Department or the head of the Department from one place to another by that designation.

Mr. LANGLEY. But not appointed under a designation which requires or implies the qualifications that the employee does not possess?

Mr. MANN. This requires no qualifications.

Mr. LANGLEY. "Stenographer" implies certain qualifications that are necessarily implied.

Mr. MANN. It would require qualifications if there was to be an examination; but when you provide for a place and expressly say that there shall be no test of the applicant or of the appointee, you remove the qualifications, and I do not know what excuse the gentleman can offer or what reason can be given that these people should not have some kind of an examination.

Mr. LANGLEY. Simply because (if for no other reason) of the fact that their duties are of a confidential and exceptional character; and that is so to such an extent that no written form of examination could be prescribed that would be a fair test of the peculiar qualifications that the Director of the Census would want.

Mr. MANN. I am not talking about a competitive examination; I am not saying that these people should be subjected to a competitive examination; but the proposition is that when the Director selects these people they shall go in without any test whatever as to their fitness for the office, and the gentleman, who can give me cards and spades about appointments, knows from his own personal experience that many people are recommended and a good many appointed to places absolutely without fitness for the place.

Mr. LANGLEY. I know also that some of the most efficient employees in the Census Office are those who did not take any examination at all.

Mr. MANN. But they could have passed an examination, could they not?

Mr. LANGLEY. Certainly; but——

Mr. MANN. Then what is the object of refusing to require them to take an examination, where they can take the examination, and where they can pass the examination, and the examination is not competitive? Why, even in the consular service it used to be so that they required no examination; but they now require an examination. It is the whole tendency of the Government to require that a man who is appointed to a place shall take some kind of an examination. Why are these particular places excepted? What is the reason which can be given for saying that men of high position in the Census Office shall have no examination? I am not saying they should be required to pass a competitive examination, because I am aware of the fact that that would be words wasted at this time.

Mr. LANGLEY. Would the gentleman have the Assistant Director subjected to some sort of an examination?

Mr. MANN. Oh, the sentence that I refer to does not provide for the appointment of an Assistant Director at all. The section provides for the appointment of the Assistant Director by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the sentence which I wish to amend does not have anything to do with the appointment of the Assistant Director.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, there are twelve places that would be affected by the gentleman's amendment. The Assistant Director would not be affected at all, and neither would the private secretary to the Director. If the gentleman's amendment prevails, it will leave the appointment of these clerks and officers, I presume, as the law now provides. Those that are not required to be examined under the present law would not, of course, be required to be examined under the provisions of this bill, but it does this: Striking out "without examination" leaves the subject to be controlled by the law and the examinations would necessarily be competitive, and they would necessarily be under the civil-service law.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will pardon me, but if you strike out the words "without examination" it leaves it optional with the Director to require the examination, because where you change the civil-service law in this respect by providing that the appointment shall be made by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor upon the recommendation of the Director of the Census, that takes it out of the civil-service law, and under this you forbid the making of an examination.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My understanding of the effect of the gentleman's amendment is to place these positions as far as they are applicable under the civil-service law.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is not the case at all.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Then I misunderstand the scope of that law. I understand the law provides for the appointment of certain officers, and if that class are within the classified service, there being no exception in the law, they must be appointed in the regular way.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. But your qualification was "so far as applicable." That is the milk in the cocoanut.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I meant so far as covered by the law.

Mr. LANGLEY. That would cover everyone except the Assistant Director.

Mr. MANN. If we provide for the creation of the places and went no further, it is extremely likely they would be appointed under the civil service, but when we provide by whom the appointment shall be made it takes it out from the civil-service law. The gentleman from Kentucky shakes his head, but he is simply in error——

Mr. LANGLEY. Simply right in this case.

Mr. MANN. It is held all through in every Department. It is a provision which has been stricken out in the legislative bill, in the Indian bill, a dozen times, nearly, within the last few weeks, because it is held that provision takes it out of the civil-service law. When you provide for the creation of places the law provides who shall appoint them, how they shall be divided, but when you provide for the creation of the places and authorize a particular official of the Government to appoint them the Civil Service Commission has nothing to do with it, and it is a change of the law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman may be right, but as I understand the law authorizes somebody to appoint every functionary in the Government. There must be specific authority for some particular head of Department or some particular bureau to appoint every officer we have. We have authority somewhere, and it is specific, and I insist the civil-service law does apply to specific provisions in law in relation to the power of appointment.

But I do not care to discuss that question, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman from Illinois says that this amendment would simply turn the whole question over to the Director to be exercised at his option. The Director has already exercised his option of recommending the identical provision in the bill. The commission that was appointed by the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor, the head of which was Carroll D. Wright, a noted civil-service reformer, and his associates, Walter F. Willcox, Davis R. Dewey, and Willet M. Hays, recommended this provision of the bill. There are good reasons why these appointments should be made in this manner, and the Director of the Census is the best judge of any man in the country as to the peculiar kind of qualifications that are necessary for performing this work. The law imposes upon him the responsibility of its success, and of course he naturally expects as free a hand as is possible under the circumstances, in order that he may perform this tremendous work and meet properly the great responsibility that rests upon his shoulders, and he expects a corresponding degree of authority. Then, in regard to the chief statistician, a man who must be tried and experienced in statistical work.

The Director of the Census has been for more than twenty years engaged in statistical work, and he probably knows every statistician of prominence in all this country. Allow him to select the chief statistician, or recommend the one he wants as chief statistician, to the Secretary of the Department. Do not subject a man who occupies a position of such importance and prominence, and who takes it largely on account of the prestige it might give him, do not humiliate him by subjecting him to the ordinary pass examination to get into Government service, where perhaps he would be performing service for half the money he might receive for equivalent service in private life.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman permit? Would not it reconcile his views with those of the gentleman from Illinois if instead of striking out the words "without examination" you insert between them the word "competitive," so that it would read "without competitive examination?" That would clearly leave it free from any civil-service examination, but would permit such examination as might be deemed necessary.

Mr. MANN. It would certainly meet my views.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The last census had a provision for the very class of officers now asked for, and the gentleman from Illinois is the only man I have heard of who insists or contends that this class of officers, twelve in number, should be subject to a test examination.

Mr. OLMSTED. The gentleman referred particularly to stenographers. Of course nobody ought to be appointed as a stenographer without some examination by somebody capable of passing upon his fitness, but I would not employ one on a civil-service examination alone.

Mr. HAY. The effect of the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would be that if the President chose he could put the twelve places under civil service. They are not places that ought to be under the civil service. But as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] has suggested, they are places to be filled by expert statisticians, and there can be no good purpose served in having them placed under civil service. It will be practically impossible to get the character of men that are needed for these places by putting them in that service. It has never been done, and these words are placed in the bill for the purpose, I assume, of not having them obtained in that way. I do not see any good reason to be obtained by adopting the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. LANGLEY. In addition to what the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] has said, and in reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] I want to state that the precise question as to whether the language of this section, if the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is adopted, would classify these places, has been passed upon by the Supreme Court. I can not cite the case, but the question is settled. Unless you put in some qualifying language which expressly indicates that Congress intends the places to be left outside of the civil service, the civil-service law and rules and regulations adopted pursuant thereto will cover them.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken as to that. That is easily gotten at by adopting the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] in place of my amendment and inserting between the words "without examination" the word "competitive," so it shall read, "without competitive examination." That clearly takes the matter out of appointment through the Civil Service Commission and yet gives the Director the opportunity to test in some way the quality of a stenographer which this bill would permit.

Mr. LANGLEY. I was addressing myself, Mr. Chairman, to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois wherein he asserted that the amendment which he proposed, if adopted, would not place these places in the classified service.

Mr. MANN. That is true. It will not leave them in the classified service.

Mr. LANGLEY. I desire to say that the gentleman is not correct. It would place them in the classified service. I did not want the statement to go unchallenged in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to withdraw my amendment and offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I now desire to offer an amendment, that in line 11, page 2, the word "competitive" be inserted before the word "examination."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 11, page 2, before "examination," insert "competitive," so as to read, "shall be appointed without competitive examination."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. I have another amendment I wish to offer. In line 14, page 2, strike out "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 14 and 15, strike out the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. BURLESON. I would like to have the gentleman state the reason for that.

Mr. MANN. The Constitution does not require that this official shall be appointed and confirmed by the Senate, and the only reason that can actuate anybody, that I can see, to have these positions confirmed by the Senate is in order to increase the already too greatly augmented power of Senators of the United States. This bill proposes to except these positions from the operations of the civil-service law, and the moment these principal officials, who appoint the officials below them, are required to be confirmed by the Senate it means that the Senators will control absolutely the appointment of all of the lower officials. The Constitution does not require it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My impression is that the Constitution requires the appointments of the President to be approved by the Senate. If it does not, I have no objection to the gentleman's amendment. I do not care whether they are confirmed or not.

Mr. MANN. I read from section 2, Article II of the Constitution, as follows:

But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

All through this bill it is provided that appointments shall be made by the Director of the Census.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

SEC. 5. That during the decennial census period the annual compensation of the officials of the Census Office shall be as follows: The Director of the Census, $7,500; the private secretary to the Director, $2,500; the Assistant Director, $5,000; the chief statisticians, $3,500 each; the chief clerk, $3,000; the disbursing clerk, $3,000; the appointment clerk, $3,000; the geographer, $2,750; the chiefs of divisions, $2,250 each, and the stenographers provided for in section 3 of this act, $2,000 each.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment to this section, and, by way of explanation, I desire to state that the salaries fixed by this section are very much in excess of the salaries paid to employees in other Executive Departments performing the same or very similar service. I think it is an unwise policy for us to fix these salaries above those paid in other Departments. It is just such discriminations about which Congress complains so much at each succeeding session. I therefore propose to reduce the salaries of the statisticians to $3,000, which is $750 in excess of the salary paid to the actuary of the Treasury Department, the only officer whose duties correspond at all with those of chief statisticians. I propose also to reduce the salary of the disbursing clerk to $2,500, which is the salary paid to the disbursing clerk in the War Department, where there is a great deal more money disbursed. I also propose to reduce the salary of the chiefs of divisions, in lines 22 and 23, from $2,250, as proposed, to $2,000, making the salary correspond with the salaries paid chiefs of divisions in other bureaus, and the salary of stenographer to $1,800, which is the highest salary paid to any stenographer employed by any Cabinet officer in the Government service.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for the purpose of obtaining information?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman tell what are the duties of the appointment clerk?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know that I can correctly state what the duties of the appointment clerk are, and I do not care to undertake to do so in the presence of a gentleman who has served in that capacity from the State of Kentucky, and I will let him answer the gentleman from Wisconsin in my time.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I fear that I might more or less embarrass the gentleman from Minnesota if I should undertake to tell in detail all the duties of the appointment clerk of the Census Office. [Laughter.] Congressional courtesy would estop me in a good many instances. I take it that the gentleman's question is not seriously intended to call for a reply.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I assure the gentleman that it was. I do not know what the duties of the appointment clerk are.

Mr. LANGLEY. The duties of the appointment clerk, in a general way, are the same as those performed by other appointment clerks in other branches of the Government service.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What are they?

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman can read the law and get at that. I can not give them all now.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman that the appointment clerk is not the man who makes the appointment, but selects from those recommended those who, in his judgment, would be best qualified and gives the Director the benefit of his judgment.

Mr. LANGLEY. I took it for granted that the gentleman knew that. Of course he has not the actual appointing power.

Mr. TAWNEY. Of course, in the Departments now that are under the classified service the duty of the appointment clerk is materially changed. The duty of the appointment clerk of the Treasury Department is to make selection from the eligible register of the certifications that are sent to the Treasury Department, and the same with reference to the various other Departments.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I express my surprise that the appointment clerk does not make the appointment.

Mr. TAWNEY. He makes the selection from the recommendations for the heads of departments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment.

On page 3, lines 18 and 19, strike out the words "five hundred"—

Mr. LANGLEY. I want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the appointment clerk does not make the appointments, but he does carry out the details in connection with the work of making appointments. The appointment clerk of the Twelfth Census, I remember, had a considerable portion of his time taken up by distinguished gentlemen in both Houses of Congress in discussing innumerable questions in that connection. It is a difficult job in any branch of the Government, and an enormous one in the Census Office during the emergency period. I would not think of undertaking it again at the salary that I received during the taking of the Twelfth Census.

Mr. PERKINS. May I ask if these appointments were under the civil service, if the gentleman's labors would not have been very much lighter?

Mr. LANGLEY. But the census, in my judgment, would in that event have been impossible. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, these amendments I have proposed here——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Have they been stated?

The CHAIRMAN. They have not yet been reported.

The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, lines 18 and 19, strike out the words "five hundred," so that it will read "three thousand." Line 20, strike out the words "three thousand" and insert "two thousand five hundred," so that it will read "disbursing clerk, two thousand five hundred." In lines 22 and 23, strike out the words "two thousand two hundred and fifty" and insert "two thousand," so that it will read "chiefs of division, two thousand," and in line 25, strike out "two thousand" and insert "one thousand eight hundred," so that it will read "and the stenographers provided for in section 3 of this act, $1,800 each."

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield for just a moment?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will yield to the gentleman in just a minute. I want to say one word in explanation of these amendments. These salaries, which are proposed by the amendment I have just offered, are made to conform to the salaries of similar offices in the Treasury Department, where the duties are more responsible than they will be in the office of the Director of the Census, and also correspond with the salaries of similar employees in the War and other Departments. I do not think we should encourage this discrimination further.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman recognize the difference between a permanent place at a fixed salary and the obtaining of the services of an expert in a temporary office at the same salary?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do; but that has not influenced the recommendation of the Committee on the Census in respect to the other employees who are classified or provided for in classes 1, 2, 3, and 4. The services of those employees will be temporary, but they will receive only the compensation provided by statute for classes 1, 2, 3, and 4. I do not think the fact of their services being for three years, instead of a life tenure, should make any difference. I am very certain, however, that these particular officers or employees will be appointed under the classified service, and before their temporary services expire they will have found a way of being transferred into some other Department at the same salary allowed in this bill.

Mr. PERKINS. Does not the gentleman think that in leaving the salaries of the stenographers, by the amendment as proposed, at $1,800, he is still leaving them at a very high figure.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do.

Mr. PERKINS. There are competent stenographers appointed under the civil service in Washington who are glad when they reach a salary of $1,200; and that these men, appointed without any civil-service examination, should at once be placed at a salary of $1,800, does not seem to be quite fair. I hope the gentleman will put it at $1,500, which will be more than liberal.

Mr. TAWNEY. I appreciate that fact, but I do not want to appear in the attitude of criticising too severely the salaries fixed by the Committee on the Census. There are stenographers now to Cabinet officers who receive $1,800 a year. I will say that upon the recommendation of one of the Cabinet officers, at this session, we have reduced the compensation of his stenographer from $1,800 to $1,600. Now the duties of a stenographer to a Cabinet officer are certainly more important than the duties of the stenographers who are employed in the office of the Director of the Census. Their work is confined entirely to correspondence, and correspondence of a rather unimportant character as compared with the correspondence of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and other Cabinet officers.

Mr. LANGLEY. The Twelfth Census act provided for two stenographers at $2,000 each.

Mr. TAWNEY. If it did, it was too much.

Mr. LANGLEY. I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the gentleman is through speaking in relation to the salary of the expert stenographers provided in this section, I call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that there are stenographers and stenographers. The stenographers provided here are two in number, the same as was provided in the law for the taking of the Twelfth Census, and they perform the duties of confidential secretaries in a large degree. They do not simply do mechanical work.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is true also with reference to the Cabinet officers. You can not justify the discrimination upon that ground.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will answer the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS]. They do not perform simply the mechanical work of taking the dictation and writing it out upon a typewriting machine. There is a large volume of correspondence in the Census Office during the decennial period, which the expert stenographers will be expected to handle themselves.

Mr. PERKINS. But the stenographer to every Member of Congress is largely a confidential stenographer. The same is true of the stenographer to any business man or lawyer.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the duties and responsibilities of a Member's secretary measure up in magnitude and importance to the work of the Census Office, that has 70,000 employees during the decennial period, then the comparison may have some value.

Mr. PERKINS. They will have hundreds of other stenographers besides those two.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman from New York is somewhat of an economist, and yet he votes year by year to pay the stenographers who are employed as the reporters of the debates of the House $5,000 a year for an average of about five month's work in the year. He votes every year to pay the stenographers who take the statements and arguments made before committees of the House $5,000 a year; yet their work is entirely mechanical, and does not average more than five months in the year. Now, he finds a good deal of fault because these expert Census Bureau stenographers, who carry large responsibilities and must have the ability to answer letters without dictation, are to be paid $2,000 a year, the amount which we paid the same officers ten years ago.

Mr. PERKINS. My friend, on the other hand, who is a lawyer, knows perfectly well that stenographers who are able to report cases in court, and still more those who are able to report the debates in the House, are an entirely different class of people from the stenographers whom the gentleman and I, and other lawyers and business men, employ to dictate their correspondence to, or who will be employed to do such work here. Their capacity is as different as that of the lawyer who tries a case in court from that of the clerk whom he employs in his office.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But this provision is for expert stenographers.

Mr. MANN. It does not say so.

Mr. OLMSTED. The salary says so.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There are to be two expert stenographers, who not only can take evidence in court, but try the cases in the bargain.

Mr. PERKINS. They are not required for any such work as is called for in the Census Office.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. As I said before, they will be employed as confidential secretaries, and we provide for other stenographers in the Census Office at lower rates.

Now, in relation to the disbursing officer, $2,500 is a low salary for an officer required in three years' time to disburse and be responsible for over $14,000,000. The bond that he is required to give is increased to $100,000. Where is there a county treasurer in this entire country who receives so small a sum for the responsibility and performing the service required of the disbursing officer provided for in this bill?

Mr. MANN. Does not the Government pay for the bond?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No.

Mr. MANN. I will guarantee that the Government pays for the bond.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The accounts of the disbursing officer have to be kept covering the great army of employees, 65,000, and those accounts must be supervised, and the disbursing officer is responsible for the accuracy of every one of them. It seems to me, in view of the responsibility and the arduous work that the supervising officer has to do, that $3,000 is a very small salary.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] suggested a thought to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], and that is that these officers are temporary. Take an expert statistician, if he is out of a job and could not get one in these times, the chances are that he would not be a very expert statistician. Would a competent man give up a permanent position he already has to go into the Census Office for a term that may not exceed three years at a salary below that provided in the bill? These salaries in some respects are a little higher than the salaries fixed for the Twelfth Census. I notice, in reading the legislative appropriation bill, that they conform very closely to the salaries paid, not for the same class of service, but service not nearly so laborious as that required in the Census Office.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word in relation to the subject of appointment clerk. The language of the bill is, "The appointment clerk shall perform the appointment duties assigned to the disbursing clerk in section 4 of the act approved March 6, 1902, entitled 'An act to provide for a permanent Census Office.'" But in section 4 of that act there is not a word as to the appointment duties that are said to be assigned to the disbursing clerk. Section 4 of the act of March 6, 1902, provides "that there shall be in the Census Office, to be appointed by the Director thereof, * * * a disbursing clerk who shall also act as appointment clerk at an annual salary of $2,500."

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman is reading from the act for the Twelfth Census.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am reading from the act approved March 6, 1902, referred to in the pending bill.

Mr. PARSONS. If the gentleman will read page 32 of the report of the committee, section 4, he will find this language: "A disbursing clerk who shall also act as appointment clerk."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is exactly what I alluded to. What I also call the attention of the gentleman from New York to is this language in the pending bill: "The appointment clerk shall perform the appointment duties assigned to the disbursing clerk," in section 4 of the act of 1902. But there are no "appointment duties" prescribed in section 4 of the act of 1902. The duties of the disbursing clerk are thus defined in that section:

The disbursing clerk herein provided for shall, before entering upon his duties, give bond to the Secretary of the Treasury in the sum of $25,000, which bond shall be conditioned that the said officer shall render a true and faithful account to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury quarter-yearly, of all moneys and properties which shall be received by him by virtue of his office, with surety to be approved by the Solicitor of the Treasury. Such bond shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, to be by him put in suit upon any breach of the conditions thereon.

Does this make any mention of appointment duties? Not at all.

On the top of the next page of the bill is this language:

The disbursing clerk of the Census Office shall, at the beginning of the decennial census period, give an additional bond in the sum of $100,000.

To account for what? To account for property.

This bill provides for the payment of a salary of $3,000 to the appointment clerk, and the question is, What are the appointment clerk's duties? I infer from what was said that the appointment clerk is put as a buffer between the Director of the Census and Congressmen who go down to his office after patronage. When you come to analyze it that is exactly it. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] practically admitted this, and then sought to retract when I asked if the appointment clerk made the selections.

Mr. LANGLEY. Not at all.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question. Do I understand the gentleman to contend now that during the decennial census period this officer will receive the salary of the disbursing officer, a disbursing clerk, and also the salary of an appointment clerk?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I shall have to leave the gentleman to construe that for himself.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is what I would like to know, what the law is on that subject. My impression is that he may draw two salaries.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I want the gentleman to understand that when I say I propound a question for information I mean it. I want to know what the appointment duties are, and if this appointment clerk is to perform the appointment duties of the disbursing clerk, and the disbursing clerk has no appointment duties, and if he is to get a salary of $3,000 for duties not assigned to him, what the bill means by retaining the title "disbursing clerk."

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to suggest to the gentleman that hearing tales of woe from Congressmen and applicants for places was only one of the many functions of the appointment clerk.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I know; but is that assigned to him by section 4? Why does the bill retain that language which unintentionally misleads the House. Of course the committee did not mean to mislead the House, but I was misled by it.

Mr. LANGLEY. I am trying to answer the question, if the gentleman will pardon me. In the Twelfth Census Office there was an appointment clerk who was entirely independent of the disbursement clerk. When the permanent Census Office was organized these were consolidated. The act establishing that office provided that those two positions should in the permanent office be combined. It was an experiment, but it was believed that by combining the duties of the appointment and disbursing clerks, so that they could be performed by the same official, greater accuracy and expedition, especially in the work of disbursements, would be secured and that this combination was entirely practicable, except during the emergency periods. And the experiment was a success.

Mr. PAYNE. Was it not also understood and felt that the simple office of appointment clerk during that period would not furnish sufficient work to meet the abilities of the gentleman who held it at that time and so they put those duties on him?

Mr. LANGLEY. Not having been a Member of this honorable body at that time, I do not know what Congress understood and felt.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course the gentleman's modesty would not allow him to admit it, but I think that is probably the case. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANGLEY. I do know that the combined duties of appointment and disbursing clerk of the Census Office were a great deal more onerous than it was thought they would be at the time the permanent census act was passed. During the interim between the decennial census periods, I believe that it is as a matter of administrative——

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to interrupt the gentleman for a moment. Under this bill are we to have two separate clerks, one an appointment clerk and one a disbursing clerk?

Mr. LANGLEY. Certainly; just as we had in the Twelfth Census.

Mr. HARDWICK. Or is it, as some gentlemen seem to think, one clerk to draw two salaries?

Mr. LANGLEY. Not at all; and I am trying to show the gentleman——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; but I wish——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Why did you use the words "disbursing clerk?" In section 3 you provide specifically for the appointment of a chief statistician, and then, in line 8, for an appointment clerk, and omit the disbursing clerk.

Mr. LANGLEY. Simply because the existing law, the permanent census act, regulates that. That contains a provision for a permanent disbursing clerk, and this merely creates the position of temporary appointment clerk and transfers the appointment duties from the disbursing clerk to the appointment clerk who is provided for in section 3, and for this decennial period only. At the end of that period, in the absence of further legislation to the contrary, the duties of this temporary appointment clerk will, of course, devolve again upon the permanent disbursing clerk.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Exactly. Now then, we come to the point that confronted me when I first read it. What are the duties of the appointment clerk? What is the appointment clerk if there is to be a disbursing clerk also?

Mr. LANGLEY. I am coming to that. It will be utterly impossible during this decennial census period and when this emergency work is in progress for one man to perform the duties of disbursing officer and at the same time perform the duties of appointment clerk.

Mr. PAYNE. What became of the office of disbursing clerk when this law establishing the permanent Bureau was passed?

Mr. LANGLEY. The permanent census act continued that. It provided for the continuance of the office of disbursing clerk and abolished the office of appointment clerk, assigning his duties to the disbursing clerk.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It consolidated the work in one position.

Mr. PAYNE. I think that explains the situation fully.

Mr. LANGLEY. I would have explained it earlier if the gentlemen had permitted me. I want to say that another important duty of the appointment clerk for the Twelfth Census, and the same will be true of the Thirteenth Census, I assume, was to supervise all the correspondence in connection with the appointments and examinations, and when you remember that there were about 3,400 or 3,500 appointments, and twice as many examined, you will readily see what an enormous undertaking that was of itself.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LANGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If we should not enact this bill into law containing this provision, the appointment duties assigned to the disbursing clerk by section 4 of this act—because there are no appointment duties——

Mr. LANGLEY. Of course.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Of course the bill does not define a particular duty for each clerk. It is generally understood in the Department what the duties of an appointment clerk are, that he shall assist in making appointments.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Pardon me, this says that those duties are assigned to it by section 4, and there is not a word concerning this in section 4, therefore that should be amended.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. In section 4 of the permanent Census Bureau act it says:

A chief clerk, at an annual salary of $2,500, who, in the absence of the Director, shall serve as Acting Director; a disbursing clerk, who shall also act as appointment clerk.

Now, that is the assignment of duties. They assign him to the duties of appointment clerk, and now during the temporary period we separate those duties and create a new office, the office of appointment clerk for the temporary period only, and he is required to perform the responsibilities of appointment clerk, a very responsible office, because it does take a lot of time. If the Director had to do this work personally he would not have much time for anything else. His time taken up with supervisory authority is such as to require all his time and it can not be taken for these details.

Mr. LANGLEY. I will call attention to the fact that this bill does not define the duties of chief clerk for that matter. The general duties of appointment clerks in the various branches of the service were, I thought, generally understood.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment reported, and I ask to have a vote taken on each amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, in lines 18 and 19, strike out "five hundred," so the clause will read "the chief statisticians, $3,000 each."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 20, strike out "$3,000" and insert "$2,500," so the clause will read "the disbursing clerk, $2,500."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say this $2,500 is $250 in excess of what we pay to the disbursing officer of the Navy Department, who has the disbursement of over a hundred million dollars every year.

Mr. LANGLEY. But not 70,000 accounts to audit.

Mr. TAWNEY. He handles more accounts than they do in the Census Bureau.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The disbursing officer of the Census does more in one month than the disbursing officer in the Navy Department does in ten.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows.

On page 3, line 23, strike out "two hundred and fifty," so it will read "the chiefs of divisions, $2,000 each."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, that is the salary paid to the chiefs of divisions in all other Departments—$2,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 25, noes 35.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 25 strike out "two thousand" and insert "one thousand eight hundred," so that the clause will read:

"And the stenographers provided for in section 3 of this act, $1,800 each."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 28, noes 37.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That in addition to the force hereinbefore provided for and to that already authorized by law there may be employed in the Census Office during the decennial period, and no longer, as many clerks of classes 4, 3, 2, and 1; as many clerks, copyists, computers, and skilled laborers, with salaries at the rate of not less than $600 nor more than $1,000 per annum, and as many messengers, assistant messengers, messenger boys, watchmen, unskilled laborers, and charwomen, as may be found necessary for the proper and prompt performance of the duties herein required, these additional clerks and employees to be appointed by the Director of the Census: Provided, That the total number of such additional clerks of classes 2, 3, and 4 shall at no time exceed 100: And provided further, That employees engaged in the compilation or tabulation of statistics by the use of mechanical devices may be compensated on a piece-price basis to be fixed by the Director.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out that section. I want to say for the information of the committee that if this section is stricken out I shall also move to strike out the next section, and my motive for doing so is this: In the first place, section 6, as drafted—and I say this without intending any criticism upon the Committee on the Census at all—is one of the most peculiarly worded sections authorizing the employment of personal service in any bureau or any Department in Washington that I have ever seen or ever read. Authority is given to the Director of the Census here, without any estimate whatever as to what number of clerks may be required of these various classes, to employ as many as he sees fit to employ up to a maximum of 100. And he may employ as many messengers as he sees fit to employ, he may employ as many charwomen as he sees fit to employ, and as many laborers as he may see fit to employ without any restrictions or limitations whatever.

Now, there is no necessity for any authorization for clerks at this time. The Director of the Census may be authorized at the next session of Congress to appoint clerks and he can then submit estimates in detail as to the number of clerks that will be required for the service. He can not make an estimate now. He can after this bill passes and becomes a law without this section, knowing the character of the work required.

With the aid of that information and with the aid of the experience of the Bureau, submit a detailed estimate to Congress as to the number of clerks that will be required and the number in each of the different classes, the number of charwomen, and the number of messengers. In this way we can avoid the blanket authority for the appointment of clerks and the payment of salaries out of lump-sum appropriations. While you specify the different classes you put no limitation at all upon the number that may be employed in each class, except the limitation of 100, which is 55 more than in the old law. Now, I think the chairman of the committee will agree with me that neither of these two sections are at all essential at this time. These clerks that are provided for in section 6 and section 7 will not be appointed until after the expiration of the current fiscal year, so that there will be ample time to provide for them at the next session of Congress. Then the Director of the Census can submit an estimate in detail as to the number of clerks in all of these different classes that will be required, and the committee of the House will have an opportunity to examine into the necessity of the number estimated for, just as the committee of the House examines the estimates from other Departments. I submit to the gentleman in charge of the bill that we ought not to give this wide-open authority to the Director of the Census to employ as many people as in his judgment may be necessary outside of the classified service. Who can tell to-day that 100 clerks in classes 1, 2, 3, and 4 will be required? I think it is bad legislation and necessarily leads to bad administration.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if he has not overlooked the statement of the unlimited authority given by the provision in line 5? Before that he can employ "as many clerks in classes 4, 3, 2, and 1," and then it goes on and says "as many clerks, copyists, computers, and skilled laborers, with salaries at the rate of not less than $600 nor more than $1,000 per annum." There is no limit on that class.

Mr. TAWNEY. None at all.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman spoke of the unskilled laborers, messengers, and watchmen. The proviso limits only the number of clerks in classes 1, 2, 3, and 4, so that the unlimited part seems to be greater than the gentleman stated.

Mr. TAWNEY. I am obliged to the gentleman from New York for calling attention to it. I intended to call attention to the provision here which says, "as many clerks, copyists, computers, and skilled laborers, with salaries at the rate of not less than $600 nor more than $1,000 per annum."

There is absolutely no limitation upon the number that he can employ. And these men will be paid largely out of lump-sum appropriations, because it will be physically impossible, or, as least claimed, I assume, to be impossible, for the Census Bureau to submit detailed estimates in all particulars in respect to this service. And therefore many of these whose employment is authorized generally will be paid out of these lump-sum appropriations.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, in all candor to the gentleman in charge of the bill that this section ought to go out; and if it does go out, then the committee should also defer the consideration of the other section until the next session of Congress, and then both sections can be considered together.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with the gentleman from Minnesota at all. His fears are not well grounded. The Director of the Census can not employ a single clerk except the Committee on Appropriations provides money for it. The Committee on Appropriations in the first place will examine the Director of the Census; will require an estimate from him respecting the cost of administration, and that committee will report appropriations commensurate with the demands of the office as they are explained. Now, if this section goes out, there is no authority in the Director of the Census or anybody else to appoint this great army of clerks, who are necessary to carry on the work of the office. If the Committee on Appropriations next year should report a provision for so many clerks for the Census Office and so many messengers and so many charwomen and some gentleman should make a point of order against it and say, "Where is the law authorizing the appointment of clerks, messengers, etc., to the Census Office," the point of order would be sustained and the appropriation would fail.

This bill would be the authority for their appointment, and the Committee on Appropriations will be authorized, under the rules of the House, to make appropriation for the payment of a sufficient number of clerks to conduct the affairs of the Office. The Committee on Appropriations will make an investigation. The gentleman knows that. I do not understand how he came to take so utterly indefensible an attitude in relation to this question. Now, it is the same section, identically, that was in the Twelfth Census bill, a bill that the gentleman from Minnesota assisted in passing. The gentleman was a Member of the House, and I am quite sure he voted for that bill. He made no such criticism against it then; no such criticism was made against the bill by any Member of the House. The Director of the Census stated in a hearing before the Committee on the Census that it was utterly impossible for him to know how many clerks, messengers, and other employees might be required. The work is largely mechanical, and the number of employees depends somewhat upon the number of tabulating machines or mechanical devices they may be using in the Office.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, provides for emergency work; it is a stupendous undertaking, and imposes great responsibilty upon the Director of the Census. Now, the gentleman from Minnesota asks us to tie his hands. If he is to perform this work in a creditable manner and publish the results within the period fixed by the bill, he must of necessity have a large discretionary power. Every census law has recognized that fact, and no Member of the House who has any knowledge of the magnitude of the undertaking would think of requiring the Director to particularize, or of limiting him in the number of clerks and employees except through the appropriations. The committee over which the gentleman from Minnesota so ably presides is always critical of estimates and always thoroughly investigates every request for an appropriation. I will venture to say that not a single clerk, not a single messenger, not a single charwoman, will escape the scrutinizing eye of the gentleman from Minnesota. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman inform us how many clerks of classes 2, 3, and 4 were provided for the Twelfth Census?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not have that in mind.

Mr. MANN. Were they provided for except in the law providing for the Twelfth Census?

Mr. LANGLEY. There was fully as much power in the Twelfth Census act as it is proposed to give the Director in this bill.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman wants the information I can give it to him, for the purpose of asking him another question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not have it in mind.

Mr. MANN. The act provides twelve clerks of class 4, fifteen clerks of class 3, twenty of class 2. This provides for 100 clerks of class 4, if they choose to appoint them.

Mr. BURLESON. Not to exceed.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Not to exceed 100.

Mr. MANN. That is 100 if they choose to appoint them?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What reason is there for more than double the number of clerks of the three classes this census over last census?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Because I presume there are exigencies that might come up which would require them; and it is recommended by the Director, who is thoroughly familiar with the work of the last census. I presume, doubtless, that sometimes there was not a sufficient force of classified clerks in the Department in the last census. Now, I repeat, that can all be taken care of by the Committee on Appropriations.

They can take care of that when the time comes to make appropriations.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman, I think, is mistaken about that, because no census appropriation is itemized to the extent of defining the number of clerks in different classes or at different salaries. The census appropriation is a lump-sum appropriation, and while it is possible that the Committee on Appropriations might require specific estimates——

Mr. TAWNEY. The law requires it.

Mr. MANN. It is also true that the Director of the Census is unable to furnish specific estimates a year in advance, so that you have to make a lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The proposition now is for the Committee of the Whole House to impose limitations on the power of the Director of the Census in the employment of clerks that the gentleman from Illinois says the Committee on Appropriations will not be able to impose a year hence, when the appropriations are to be made.

Mr. MANN. I am not making that proposition.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman is making a statement which amounts to that.

Mr. MANN. No; I am not. Here you are making a provision for clerks of classes 1, 2, 3, and 4, and it appears that as to some of these employees you have more than doubled the number. I ask why?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We have increased the number of expert chiefs of divisions, because in the administration of the office it has been found expedient. In the last census there would be a chief of division who would be in charge of 2,000 employees sometimes, and he could not properly supervise them, and we thought it wise to create eight or ten more subdivisions with chiefs over them, in order that the work in the office could have adequate supervisory control.

Mr. MANN. You only provide for eight expert chiefs of division.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Eight in addition to those there are in the office now, and we have in the permanent office now as many as we had in the office during the Twelfth Census.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean to say that the permanent office, which is only carried along for the purpose of getting ready to take the Thirteenth Census, already has as many expert chiefs of division as they had when they were actually taking the last census?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will correct that. I think there are one or two less.

Mr. MANN. I should hope they had a good many less.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This bill provides for eight additional chiefs of divisions.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will allow me, I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question, and perhaps the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will also be interested in it. I notice when we were considering the last section the economical soul of my friend on the left was highly agitated about the question of salaries. His economy then was on the side of high salaries for clerks and stenographers. The argument which he made, and which was accepted by my friend from Indiana, was that the appointees in the Office should have higher salaries, because they were only to be employed for three years and then turned out. Now, why should not all these clerks in this section be similarly treated? Has the gentleman from Indiana overlooked the fact that they are only to be employed for three years, during the census period, and then to be turned out? Why is it that they are not paid on a higher basis? Is not the argument as good here as it was on the last section? Of course I voted for the reduction of the salaries on the other section and I am in favor of leaving these salaries without increasing them; but I wanted explanations from the gentlemen. I wanted them to reconcile their attitude on this section with their attitude on the other.

Mr. MANN. In order to ease the soul of the gentleman, I will say to him that I propose to offer an amendment fixing the highest salaries here at $1,200 instead of $1,000. I think they are too cheap as they are now.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That, I suppose, will obviate the necessity of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] offering that amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. As I said, I am satisfied with this, but I wanted the gentleman from Indiana to explain it.

Mr. OLMSTED. I am not disturbed about the amount of discretionary power proposed to be put in the hands of the Census Director. I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana ought of itself to be sufficient to induce us to retain the provision, for without it the next Congress can not appropriate in the general appropriation bill for a single clerk against the objection of any Member that it violates the rule of the House against appropriating for any object without previous authority of law.

This act is to provide the previous authority of law. When we have done that we have practically placed this Census Bureau, in that regard, upon precisely the same footing as every one of the Departments of the Government, which is already authorized by act of Congress to appoint as many clerks as it pleases, provided the Appropriation Committee will appropriate for them. There is no limit on the number of clerks that may be appointed in the Treasury or War Department or the Navy Department. All that is required is to get an appropriation, and the Department may appoint the clerk.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say in that respect the gentleman is mistaken. The estimate as to the number of clerks required for the fiscal year in the Treasury and other Departments is submitted to Congress in order that the Congress may determine the amount that shall be appropriated, and also determine the number of clerks that shall be employed.

Mr. OLMSTED. That is not in contradiction of anything I have said. The general act now on the statute book gives unlimited authority to the heads of the several Departments to appoint as many clerks as they please, provided Congress will appropriate for their salaries. They come to the Appropriation Committee and say, "We want an appropriation for so many clerks." That is exactly what the head of the Census Bureau will do when this provision shall become law. He will come in and say he needs so many clerks, and if he convinces the committee, he will get the appropriation for them. If he does not, he will have difficulty. The Director of the Census will stand, when we pass section 6, in precisely the same position that the head of every Department stands to-day.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from Minnesota this time is wrong on this proposition, and for this reason: If this section should go out of the bill and the Committee on Appropriations should bring in in the legislative bill next time appropriations specifying a certain number of clerks for the Census Office which exceeded the number now in the permanent Census Office, it would be subject to a point of order. Any one could say there is no provision of law authorizing the Director of the Census to employ these specific clerks, and hence the item goes out on a point of order. While they could make a lump-sum appropriation for the census which could be used for the employment of clerks, the Committee on Appropriations could not report specifically for the employment of any certain number of clerks, because there is no authority in the law providing for the employment of those clerks. If this provision remains in the bill, the Director has authority to appoint such clerks as he pleases, and he will not employ anybody that is not appropriated for, because nobody will go in unless he can draw a salary.

Under this provision the Committee on Appropriations may, if it is required, specifically state how many clerks in class 1, how many in class 2, how many in classes 3 and 4, how many copyists, how many charwomen, how many laborers or messengers, and may report specifically the items for the number they find to be proper, and these provisions are not subject to a point of order in the House. It seems to me for that reason that we ought to put in the provision in the bill, so that in the future the House will have better control over the appropriations.

Now, my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE] seemed to desire to call attention to the fact—which I am glad to have called to the attention of the House and go in the RECORD—that I just voted in favor of paying larger salaries for the temporary places. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that there is any reason why we should undertake to take the census with cheap employees. Nor do I believe it possible to obtain the service of expert census takers at the same salary where the positions are temporary that we pay for salaries in the permanent bureau and Departments of Government, nor do I believe we ought to expect or require the large number of clerks who will undoubtedly be brought to Washington from places all over the United States to serve here at a salary of a thousand dollars a year. It seems to me, that since we have raised, for instance, the pay of clerks of Members of Congress from $1,200 to $1,500 a year within a short period of time, if we expect to bring young men of the country to Washington to do this census work, we ought to be willing to pay them at least $100 a month for their best services.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Does my friend anticipate that they will be brought here from many parts of the United States?

Mr. MANN. My time has expired, and I have not time to answer the question.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, in closing the debate on this amendment, I want to call to the attention of the committee the fact that in the vote which members of the committee cast against my amendments to decrease the proposed salaries in the section just passed, they have voted to increase the salaries of the employees now in the office of the Director of the Census during the period of the taking of the next census. I apprehend that many men voted upon the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that these salaries were provided for temporary employees, whereas, as a matter of fact, they have increased the salaries of permanent employees in the Director's office, and I am sorry that that distinguished watchdog of the Treasury, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] was not in his seat when this work of increasing the salaries was going on. We have increased the salary of the geographer from $2,000 to $2,750.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Two thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. TAWNEY. Two thousand dollars carried in the current law, the legislative act which I have in my hand.

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman did not even move to reduce it.

Mr. TAWNEY. And you have increased the salary of the stenographer in the Director's office from $1,500 to $2,000.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No, indeed.

Mr. TAWNEY. The current law carries the stenographer at $1,500 in the Director's office.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman is mistaken. These stenographers are in addition to those already in the office.

Mr. TAWNEY. It does not say so.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It says so in section 3.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is entirely competent for the Director of the Census to simply promote his present stenographer now getting $1,500 to a salary of $2,000.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Then he would have to appoint somebody else to his present position.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; then he will appoint somebody else for the temporary service, but at the salary now paid his stenographer—$1,500 a year.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. I simply call attention to this section, the section as already passed. All the amendments I offered to lower the salaries or equalize the salaries paid for like service in other Departments were voted down, and I simply want to advert to the fact that the committee has voted to increase the salaries of the permanent force in the office of the Director of the Census.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentlemen if they are not increasing these salaries upon the theory that they are appointed for a short term, and, if that is true, how does it happen that under that they are increasing the salaries of the fellows that have a life term?

Mr. TAWNEY. They do not distinguish between the people who are now in the Office and the people who may come into that Office under the authority of this act. Of course the clerks who are now in that Office and the stenographers who are permanently employed can be advanced to those $2,000 and $2,500 and $3,500 positions during the census period, because their experience would make them the more valuable, and then those who are appointed under this law will take the lower salaries during the census period, and when the census period has expired the people who have been brought into the Office during the census period will be dismissed and the permanent force will remain, but their salaries will then be reduced to the permanent salaries authorized under existing law. I call attention to this because of the fact that we are liable to be misled in regard to some of these provisions unless we are careful to analyze the statements that are made in regard to them. My distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] are both mistaken when they say that the number of people that will be employed under this blanket authority will be limited by the Committee on Appropriations in the next session of the Congress or whenever the appropriation is made for this service.

The appropriation for the taking of the census, as I said before, will be made largely in lump-sum appropriations. That lump sum will be available for the payment of compensation, not only to the clerks here in the city of Washington, but to the clerks all over the United States, and I imagine that the appropriation hereafter will be as it has been heretofore—that which is made for the service outside of the city of Washington will be available for the payment of compensation of those who are employed within the city of Washington, so that under this blanket authority for the appointment of clerks the only limit will be discretion of the appointing officer. It will be a physical impossibility for the Committee on Appropriations or for this House to determine how much of the appropriation will be expended for clerical service here in the city of Washington and how much will be expended outside of the city of Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, that being so, Mr. Chairman, I say that the Committee on the Census at the next session of Congress should bring in a bill specifically authorizing the appointment of as many clerks of class 1, of classes 2, 3, and 4, as in the judgment of the Director may be necessary for the carrying on of this work, also the number of charwomen, messengers, etc., and then when the Committee on Appropriations makes the appropriation for this service it will be upon estimates submitted by the Director of the Census for specific employment and not the appropriation of a lump sum out of which he may pay as many employees as he sees fit.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. OLMSTED. Why must we appropriate a lump sum? Why not appropriate for so many clerks of class 1, so many clerks of class 2, or 3, and so many of the various other classes?

Mr. TAWNEY. In order to do that we must have them estimated for, and there is no provision here for submitting a detailed estimate. I propose if this section is retained to offer an amendment requiring the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to submit in detail estimates as to the number of clerks that will be required for this service, in order that we may avoid the extravagance incident to an appropriation for payment for personal services out of a lump-sum appropriation, and I submit that inasmuch as we are now considering this law a year in advance of the time that it is necessary to pass this bill, there will be plenty of time for the Director of the Census to submit his detailed estimates to the Committee on the Census at the next session and let them bring in a bill here specifically authorizing the number of employees, so that estimates can then be regularly submitted and appropriations made for them.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota to strike out section 6 of the bill.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FULLER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 16954) to proivde for the Thirteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, and it had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. KNAPP was granted leave of absence for ten days on account of sickness in family.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 20, 1908.

Rev. EDWARD E. HALE, the Chaplain, offered the following prayer:

"For we know that, if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

And He who hath prepared us for this life "is God, who also hath given unto us the earnest of the spirit."

And we strive earnestly "that, whether present or absent, we may be accepted of Him."

Let us pray. Father, Thou art pleased to show to us day by day, month by month, hour by hour, that we are in Thy presence always, and that we pass from this life to that larger life, yes, in an instant, in the twinkling of an eye.

Come to us to-day as we learn that another has gone from this circle and that Thou art pleased that he shall be serving Thee in that larger life. Speak to us, Father, and lead us as only a father can lead us, by Thine own care and love, that we may learn the lesson of life and of what we call death. We are always with Thee, and Thou art pleased from day to day to assign to us the duty next our hand or the change through which we shall live.

We ask for ourselves; we ask for those who are nearest and dearest to us; we ask for the State that he has served, and for the nation, that with every such change we may come nearer to Thee and enter into Thy divine life. What we are here for is that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will may be done on earth as it is in heaven, and we accept the duty to enter into the life where a Father only can lead us, and to live and move and have our being in our God. In Him who is to us the resurrection and the life, the Savior of our lives, we ask it and offer it. Amen.

Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And remove from us our trespasses. Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For Thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory forever. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. ALDRICH, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

DEATH OF SENATOR ASBURY C. LATIMER.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, his friends in this Chamber were startled Monday morning with the news that a surgical operation, which was very dangerous, had been performed upon my colleague, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER], and it is now my painful duty to announce that he never sufficiently rallied to make any headway and that he died this morning at 9 o'clock.

I send to the desk a series of resolutions, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina submits the following resolutions, which will be read by the Secretary.

The resolutions were read by the Secretary, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. ASBURY C. LATIMER, late a Senator from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That a committee of ten Senators be appointed by the Vice-President to take an order arranging for the funeral of Mr. LATIMER.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect entertained by the Senate for his memory his remains be removed from Washington to South Carolina in charge of the committee, who shall have full power to carry these resolutions into effect.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these proceedings to the House of Representatives and request the House of Representatives to appoint a committee to act with the committee of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed as members of the committee under the second resolution Mr. TILLMAN, Mr. FOSTER, Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. CARTER, Mr. FRAZIER, Mr. SMITH, Mr. DIXON, and Mr. JOHNSTON.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I send another resolution to the desk, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina submits an additional resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senator the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to, and (at 12 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 21, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 20, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we find ourselves completely involved in the laws which Thou hast made. Thou art infinite; we are finite. Thou knowest the beginning and the end. We know only a little, hence we come praying for light that we may measure up to the obligations Thou hast laid upon us and fulfill all the conditions of life. "Thou giveth snow like wool; Thou scattereth the hoar frost like ashes. Thou casteth forth ice like morsels. Who can stand before Thy cold?"

In the midst of the rigors of winter hundreds are forced to idleness, without the means of subsistence. Give us light that we may solve the economic, social, and industrial problems which confront us, to the end that all who will may work and subsist.

Our hearts are bowed in sorrow, in that the Death Angel has visited our Congressional family and taken from us one who served with distinction on the floor of this House and was at his taking serving with equal distinction in the Senate Chamber.

Our sympathies go out to his colleagues and friends. Especially do we pray for the bereaved family, his wife and children. God give them grace, hope, and patience that in Thine own good time they shall meet again in a family reunion and stay in his presence forever, and glory and honor and praise be Thine. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MAKING PORT ARTHUR, TEX., A PORT OF DELIVERY, ETC.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9079) to make Port Arthur, in the State of Texas, a port of delivery in the customs collection district of Sabine, with the privilege of immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise.

Be it enacted, etc., That Port Arthur, in the State of Texas, a port of entry in the customs collection district of Sabine, be, and is hereby, constituted a port of delivery, and that the privileges of immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise conferred by the act of June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, extended to said port.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute was read, as follows:

That the privileges of the seventh section of the act approved June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," be, and the same are hereby, extended to the port of Port Arthur, in the State of Texas.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the question will be to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The request is to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the consideration of the bill just read and consider it in the House at this time. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read as follows: "A bill to extend to Port Arthur, in the State of Texas, the privilege of immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. ASBURY C. LATIMER, a late Senator from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That a committee of ten Senators be appointed by the Vice-President to take order arranging for the funeral of Mr. LATIMER.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect entertained by the Senate for his memory his remains be moved from Washington to South Carolina in charge of the committee, who shall have full power to carry these resolutions into effect.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these proceedings to the House of Representatives and request the House of Representatives to appoint a committee to act with the committee of the Senate.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senator the Senate do now adjourn.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 586. An act granting an increase of pension to Squire J. Carlin.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated:

S. 2892. An act to provide for the repayment of deposits by bidders of Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache ceded lands—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 4690. An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Napoleon B. Giddings—to the Committee on War Claims.

S. 1677. An act providing for the taking over by the United States Government of the Confederate cemetery at Springfield, Mo.—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 4546. An act to authorize the sale of timber on allotments made to Indians of the Hoopa Valley extension in California—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. 4266. An act to establish a fish-cultural station in New Mexico—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

S. 5110. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and to certain widows and dependent children of such soldiers and sailors—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 4809. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Merrimac River at Tyngs Island, Massachusetts—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 2248. An act for the improvement of the United States national cemetery at Mexico City, Mexico—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 626. An act authorizing and empowering the Secretary of War to locate a right of way for and granting the same and a right to operate and maintain a line of railroad through the Three Tree Point Military Reservation, in the State of Washington, to the Grays Harbor and Columbia River Railway Company, its successors and assigns—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of District business, and pending that motion I ask that the time for general debate be limited to two hours and also that the debate be limited to the bill under consideration. I shall call up the bill (S. 902), known as the "trackage bill."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan calls up the bill indicated, and pending that asks unanimous consent that general debate may be closed in two hours and that the debate be confined to the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to suggest to the gentleman that there has been already a good deal of debate on this subject. Does the gentleman propose to be strict in the enforcement of the five-minute rule?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. Is it the intention of the gentleman in charge of the bill to construe the five-minute debate very liberally, so that there may be opportunity for debate on the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; if there is desire for more than two hours' general debate on the bill, we would not object to that.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman why he can not agree to two hours on a side, four hours in all. Two hours would not be enough for both sides, and unless we can have that much time——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have no objection to that. Perhaps two hours would be sufficient.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. With that understanding I shall not object. I think we ought to have two hours on a side. It is a very important matter that is coming up, and with that understanding I shall raise no objection.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The time to be controlled by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] on the one side and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] on the other.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand the proposition which the gentleman makes to the House is agreeable to the minority members of the committee?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, sir; four hours of general debate.

Mr. MANN. To be divided equally?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Is that time to be equally divided?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, sir; to be equally divided.

IMPEACHMENT OF LEBBEUS R. WILFLEY.

Mr. WALDO rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. WALDO. I rise for the presentation of a privileged question.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WALDO] states that he rises to a question of privilege. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] for the present yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WALDO] is recognized.

Mr. WALDO. I desire to impeach Lebbeus R. Wilfley, of the United States court of China, of mal and corrupt conduct in office, and of high crimes and misdemeanors, and I present the following articles of impeachment and ask that they may be read at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ARTICLES FOR THE IMPEACHMENT OF LEBBEUS R. WILFLEY, JUDGE OF THE UNITED STATES COURT FOR CHINA.

To the House of Representatives of the United States of America:

Upon the petition and memorial of Lorrin Andrews in his own behalf and in the behalf of various citizens of the United States of America, residents of Shanghai, China, these articles for impeachment of Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, for high crimes and misdemeanors in the conduct of his office as such judge are presented, to wit:

CHARGE I. That said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, unmindful of the duties of his said office and in violation of his oath of office, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and of high crimes and misdemeanors in this, to wit:

That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, acting in his said office as judge of the United States court for China, was guilty of oppression and misuse of his powers as judge of said court in that he, without cause, unlawfully, maliciously, and contrary to their rights as citizens of the United States of America, refused to allow to practice before the United States court for China the following lawyers, to wit: Francis M. Brooks, Cecil Holcomb, William I. Rogers, Edwin H. Lamme, Harry L. Hart, Lorrin Andrews, and W. L. Heen, duly admitted attorneys and counselors, holding certificates of admission to practice in the United States consular court in Shanghai, China, and members of the bar regularly practicing in said consular court in China for many years, and citizens of good standing in that community and in the communities of the United States where they had formerly lived; all of whom were and are also duly admitted members in good standing of various State and Federal courts of the United States, and some of whom were attorneys and counselors of the United States Supreme Court in good standing and in regular practice there; and refused to admit said attorneys to practice in his court upon motion and upon proof of good character as provided by the rules of the Supreme Court of the United States and the Federal courts, and thereby, in effect, disbarred the said attorneys and counselors from said United States court for China without any cause, without any charges being filed against them, without any hearing or due process of law, and in defiance of the rules and practice of the United States Supreme Court and of the Federal and Territorial courts of the United States, adopted and in force since the year 1790; and thereby ruined the said attorneys and counselors in standing and reputation in that community, deprived them of their livelihood, impoverished them, and left them, citizens of the United States, in a distant country without means of support for themselves, their wives, and children.

That for many years the consular courts of the United States have existed in Shanghai and in other parts of China, and members of the bar of the various State and Federal courts of the United States have been admitted to practice upon motion and in accordance with the rules of the United States Supreme Court and of the Federal and Territorial courts of the United States.

That said above-named attorneys and counselors had been in practice in said consular courts, some of them for many years, and had acquired a large clientage and large business; and from long and honorable practice had acquired a standing and reputation in that community for honesty, integrity, and ability as attorneys and counselors and as men.

That on the 30th day of June, 1906, an act was passed by the Congress of the United States creating a United States court for China.

That by the provisions of said act, said United States court for China superseded United States consular courts for China in all civil cases where the amount in controversy exceeded $500 and in all criminal cases where the punishment might exceed $100 fine or sixty days imprisonment, or both, and gave to the said United States court for China appellate jurisdiction over the judgments of the consular courts and supervisory control over the actions of the consular courts relating to the estates of persons dying in China.

That said act provided that the practice of said court should be in accordance with the existing procedure of the consulor courts in China, with power only to modify and supplement such rules and proceedure, and further provided in all cases where treaties and law were deficient to give jurisdiction or furnish suitable remedies the common law and the law established by the decision of United States courts should be applied by said court in its decisions.

That by virtue of the said act of Congress and by virtue of the said court of China superseding and taking the place and most of the jurisdiction of said consular courts, the attorneys and counselors of said consular courts became attorneys and counselors of said United States court for China, and entitled to practice as attorneys and counselors therein.

That by virtue of said act the consular courts of China, were at once upon the passage and approval of said act, deprived of their jurisdiction to entertain and try various cases that were then pending in the said consular courts; and said cases were at once transferred to the United States court for China, and after the 30th day of June, 1906, new cases of which said court had sole jurisdiction were commenced and held until the arrival of said Judge Wilfley and organization of the said United States court for China on December 17, 1906; that all of the said time from June 30 until December 17, 1906, the attorneys and counselors of the consular courts of China had appeared as attorneys and counselors for their clients in the cases so transferred to the United States court for China, and appeared on the morning of the first day when said court opened for the purpose of protecting the interests of their said clients.

That to their surpise they were informed in open court, by said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, that he had just adopted rule 1, which he read; providing that no American lawyers would be permitted to appear and practice in his court until they had passed an examination in the following branches: Equity, evidence, pleading, contracts, torts, international law, criminal law, United States Revised Statutes affecting consular courts, and wills and administration of estates, and then announced that he would hold such an examination one week from that day.

That unless this examination was passed at that time no attorneys of the United States, regardless of the certificates which they held, would be allowed to practice in the United States court for China.

That, on the contrary, attorneys of other nationalities would be allowed to practice in said court upon presentation of certificates from their respective consuls, showing that they were qualified to practice in their own consular courts.

That the said members of the American bar at Shanghai protested against this practice, asserting that they were already members of that court, and that in any event under the rules of the United States Supreme Court, they were entitled to be admitted upon motion and proof of good character.

That said Lebbeus R. Wilfley said that he would not permit anyone to practice before him until examined; that he had absolute power and could make any rules he saw fit, and that no attorneys of the United States would be permitted to practice before him until they had passed this examination.

That said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, as such judge, refused to allow any extension of time to any of the said attorneys, in which they might finish their business then pending in the United States court for China, and that he refused to allow them to appear in said court in connection with their cases transferred from the said United States consular courts.

That on the day before Christmas the said above-named attorneys and counselors, except W. L. Heen, with the two other members of the American bar of Shanghai, T. R. Jernigan and his partner, S. Fessenden, took said examination before said Wilfley.

That said Wilfley refused to allow them to take copies of the questions asked and the answers which they made.

That on the day after Christmas said Wilfley told them when they called at the court, pursuant to his direction, that the clerk of the court would inform them of the result of said examination.

That said attorneys and counselors then called upon one Hinckley, the clerk of the said court of the United States for China, and were informed that none of the said attorneys and counselors had passed, excepting only said Jernigan and Fessenden, comprising one firm.

That said attorneys and counselors, whom Wilfley said did not pass said examination, called upon said Wilfley and asked him for copies of said questions and answers, so that they could ascertain whether they had answered the questions properly or not.

That said Judge Wilfley, upon said application made to him, refused to show the questions and answers to said examination or to state in what respect any of the said attorneys and counselors at law whom he declared had not passed the examination had failed to properly answer said questions or any of them.

That the said examination was a mere sham and pretense, without any purpose or intention on the part of said Wilfley to ascertain the knowledge or qualifications of the said lawyers to practice their profession before said court, but was a mere pretext to disbar and ruin said attorneys, whom he disfavored, and to secure the whole practice of the law and business before the said United States court for China for his own favorites.

That the refusal of said Judge Wilfley to admit said attorneys to practice was not based upon any rule or proper discretion, but that said refusal was based upon gross favoritism and mal and corrupt reasons, all to the great scandal, reproach, and disrepute of the United States court for China and the administration of justice by the United States.

CHARGE II. That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, as judge of the United States court for China, unmindful of the duties of his said office and in violation of his oath of office, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and of high crimes and misdemeanors in this, to wit:

That he, the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, and while acting in that capacity was guilty of oppression and of abuse of the powers of his office and gross favoritism in that he refused to admit to practice one Edwin H. Lamme, a lawyer of over thirty-six years' practice and standing, and at that time a member of the bar of the Supreme Court of the United States, of the United States circuit court of appeals, and the United States circuit courts of the seventh and ninth circuits; several district courts of the United States and the supreme courts of Indiana and the State of California, in good standing, a veteran of the civil war, and a man of good repute in Shanghai, and in the various communities of the United States where he had previously practiced; and further

In that he refused to permit to practice one Francis M. Brooks, a lawyer of over fifteen years' practice and good standing; a member of the bar in good standing of the supreme courts of Maine, Montana, and Hawaii, who had studied in Harvard Law School, and who was one of the prominent members of the bar in the various communities where he had practiced, including Shanghai, China; and further

In that he refused to admit one Lorrin Andrews, a graduate of the New York University Law School, and a member of the bar in good standing of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the supreme court of the State of New York, and of the Territorial courts of Hawaii and for several years attorney-general of Hawaii, then or lately in charge of many important cases in the consular court of Shanghai, China, and other courts at Shanghai, and at the time or directly thereafter engaged in the conduct of cases for the Territory of Hawaii in the Supreme Court of the United States; and

In that, while refusing to admit to practice the said Lamme, Brooks, Andrews, and others, he did admit to practice one T. R. Jernigan and S. Fessenden, of no greater qualifications, learning, or standing, and permitted to practice in said court one Arthur L. Bassett, not a member of the bar of said court and never admitted to practice therein; all to the great scandal, reproach, and disrepute of said United States court for China, and the administration of justice of the United States.

CHARGE III. That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, unmindful of the duties of his office and in violation of his oath of office, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and of high crimes and misdemeanors in this, to wit:

That he, the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, as judge of the United States court for China, and while acting in that capacity was guilty of gross favoritism, in that he does and has ever since the opening of said court permitted one Arthur L. Bassett, his close friend and protégé, to practice as an attorney and counselor at law in his court in civil cases as attorney for private individuals and in criminal cases as district attorney of the United States court for China without the said Arthur L. Bassett being a member of the United States consular court for Shanghai, or ever having been admitted to practice in the said United States court for China, either upon motion or upon examination or otherwise; all to the great scandal, reproach, and disrepute of said United States court for China and the administration of justice of the United States.

CHARGE IV. That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, unmindful of the duties of his said office and in violation of his oath of office, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and high crimes and misdemeanors in this, to wit:

That he, the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, and while acting in that capacity, was guilty of oppression, abuse, and of great favoritism in the conduct of his said office in that he, without cause, willfully, unlawfully, and maliciously refused for a long time to permit to practice in the United States court for China any member of the American bar, except T. R. Jernigan and S. Fessenden, constituting the law firm of Jernigan & Fessenden, and one Arthur L. Bassett, the close friend and protégé of said Judge Wilfley, who never was admitted to practice in said court, although he has been permitted to practice as an attorney and counselor at law in said United States court for China ever since the opening of said court; in all to the great scandal and reproach and disrepute of the United States court for China and the administration of justice by the United States.

CHARGE V. That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, unmindful of the duties of said office, and in violation of his oath of office was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct in this, to wit:

That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, while acting in that capacity was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct, in holding a sham and pretended examination for admission to practice in the United States court for China, and that he falsely and corruptly and not in the exercise of any proper discretion refused to admit one Lorrin Andrews to practice in said United States court for China, alleging that he had not passed the said examination, when in truth and in fact he never intended at that time to admit said Lorrin Andrews to practice, and that a few months thereafter, when forced by circumstances to a second time examine said Lorrin Andrews for admission to practice as an attorney and counselor in said United States court for China, the said Wilfley declared that the said Lorrin Andrews had correctly answered substantially every question put to him in said examination, and stated that the indorsements of character of said Lorrin Andrews were of the highest character.

That second examination covered substantially the same ground as the first examination to which said Lorrin Andrews submitted, said Wilfley thus admitting that the pretended examination of the said Lorrin Andrews and the other members of the American bar of Shanghai, China, held by him in December, 1906, was a mere pretense and sham, all to the great scandal, reproach, and disrepute of the United States court for China, and the administration of justice by the United States.

CHARGE VI. That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, unmindful of the duties of his said office and in violation of his oath of office, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct in this, to wit:

That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, and while acting in that capacity, was guilty of misuse of his powers as such judge in that, after he had been forced by circumstances to admit said Lorrin Andrews to practice as an attorney and counselor at law in the said United States court for China, he, the said Wilfley, threatened to disbar the said Andrews as a practicing attorney and counselor at law before the United States court for China, and to ruin him in his good name and standing in his profession and deprive him of all opportunity to earn a livelihood for himself and family unless he, the said Andrews, would comply with the demand of the said Judge Wilfley, that he, the said Lorrin Andrews, dissolve his law partnership with one Francis M. Brooks, a reputable attorney of the consular courts of China, and of various State and Federal courts of the United States and under the rules and practice of the United States Supreme Court, and of the Federal and Territorial courts of the United States, entitled to practice in said United States court for China, although not permitted to do so by the said Wilfley; all to the great scandal, reproach, and disrepute of the said United States court for China, and the administration of justice by the United States.

CHARGE VII. That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, unmindful of the duties of his said office, and in violation of his oath of office, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct in this, to wit:

That the said Lebbus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, and while acting in that capacity, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and of gross oppression and misuse of his power as judge of said court, in that, upon one Lorrin Andrews refusing to accede to his demand to dissolve his partnership with one Francis M. Brooks, a reputable attorney and counselor at law of the consular courts of China, and of various State and Federal courts of the United States; that he, the said Wilfley, acting as such judge of the United States court for China, did personally commence proceedings before himself as such judge, to disbar said Lorrin Andrews on the pretended charge that said Andrews had committed perjury in the State of California, in an affidavit filed in the United States circuit court of appeals seven months prior to the commencement of the said proceedings, upon an application for a writ of habeas corpus, in the case of one S. R. Price, in which case said Price was wrongfully charged with assault with a deadly weapon, and convicted by said Wilfley sitting as a judge without a jury, and in which case said Wilfley had unlawfully and unjustly refused to admit said Price to bail pending his appeal.

That the filing of said affidavit was well known to said Wilfley at the time he admitted said Andrews to practice as an attorney and counselor at law in the said United States court for China, and, moreover, said affidavit upon its face shows that the charge of perjury made by said Wilfley was without foundation.

That the said disbarment proceedings were unlawfully and corruptly instituted by said Wilfley, acting as such judge, for the purpose of preventing said Lorrin Andrews from practicing in the United States court for China, and were false, fraudulent, and a mere pretense and sham, and well known by said Wilfley so to be, and, in fact, were intended to ruin said Andrews in business and reputation, because he (said Andrews) had refused to dissolve his partnership with said Brooks.

That when said Andrews appeared before said Judge Wilfley and protested against the unfairness, injustice, and groundlessness of said charge he (the said Wilfley), acting as said judge and plaintiff, at once overruled said objections; and upon said objections being overruled and said Andrews having at once filed his answer to said pretended charges and demanded an immediate hearing thereon, he, the said Judge Wilfley, corruptly, willfully, and unjustly refused to grant a hearing to the said Andrews and adjourned the said case indefinitely, for the pretended purpose of taking testimony in the State of California, but with the real purpose and intent of holding said charges over said Andrews as a menace to his business and reputation.

That the said Wilfley well knew that the said Andrews had committed no wrong or crime or made any statement in his affidavit that was untrue and was well aware of the contents of said affidavit long before he had permitted the said Andrews to practice as an attorney and counselor at law in the United States court for China; all to the great scandal, reproach, and disrepute of the United States court for China and the administration of justice by the United States.

CHARGE VIII. That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, unmindful of the duties of his said office and in violation of his oath of office, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and of high crimes and misdemeanors in this, to wit:

That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, and acting in that capacity, has been guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and gross abuse of the power and influence of his office as such judge in that he has intentionally and in order to gain a reputation for himself as a great reformer, falsely declared in oral and written statements that the American community in Shanghai, China, is corrupt, depraved, and was in the hands and control of depraved, corrupt, and criminal persons, and that it was necessary for him to take the extraordinary, high-handed, and unlawful method which he had pursued in order to purge said community of such criminals and disreputable persons, among whom he included the members of the bar of the United States residing in Shanghai, China; all to the great scandal, reproach, and disrepute of the United States court for China, and the administration of justice by the United States.

CHARGE IX. That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, unmindful of the duties of his said office and in violation of his oath of office, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and high crimes and misdemeanors in this, to wit:

That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, and while acting in that capacity, has been guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and of gross oppression and misuse of his powers as such judge in that he has willfully, maliciously, unlawfully, and with intent to defame and ruin the attorneys constituting the American bar in Shanghai, China, charged said attorneys by spoken word and in writing, with being disreputable persons unworthy of practicing their profession, and has urged and secured the publication of articles in the public press containing such untrue, malicious, and libelous statements, which he the said Wilfley well knew to be false and untrue, and which wrongful, malicious, and unlawful acts were committed by said Wilfley for the purpose of discrediting said attorneys with the American people, so that it would be difficult or impossible for them to obtain relief from the wrongful oppression, tyranny, and gross outrages practiced upon them by the said Wilfley, and to gain for himself the reputation of being a great reformer; all to the great scandal, reproach, and disrepute of the United States court in China and of the administration of justice by the United States.

CHARGE X. That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, unmindful of the duties of his said office and in violation of his oath of office, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and of high crimes and misdemeanors in this, to wit:

That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, while holding the office of judge of the United States court for China, and while pretending to conduct that office in the interest of great reforms and purifying the said city of Shanghai from disreputable and corrupt Americans, has allowed and permitted the carrying on in the city of Shanghai and throughout China by citizens of the United States of a lottery known as the "Shanghai Watch Club," although the same has been publicly brought to his attention.

That the agents and representatives of the said "Shanghai Watch Club" are conducting a newspaper publication in Shanghai, which was started after the appointment of said Wilfley as such judge, and which devotes a large portion of its space to the praise and laudation of the said Wilfley, together with flaming advertisements of said lottery scheme.

That the said Wilfley well knew and well knows that said lottery was driven from the Philippines and refused the rights of the United States mail as being contrary to the laws of the United States. Notwithstanding such knowledge, said Wilfley still allows the said lottery scheme to continue under his jurisdiction without prosecution or proceedings against the same in his court; all to the great scandal, reproach, and disrepute of the United States court in China and of the administration of justice by the United States.

CHARGE XI. That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, unmindful of the duties of his said office and in violation of his oath of office, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and of high crimes and misdemeanors, in this, to wit:

That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, while holding the office of judge of the United States court for China and while pretending to conduct that office in the interest of great reforms and purifying the city of Shanghai of disreputable and corrupt Americans, has allowed and permitted the establishment of a company in Shanghai known as the "China Investment Company," which is carrying on a business declared to be unlawful throughout the United States, and which same business was suppressed by the United States consular office in Canton, China, as a fraud and swindle. Said "China Investment Company" is owned and conducted and advertised by the same people who were conducting the lottery known as the "Shanghai Watch Club," and is advertised in the same paper published by the same firm and agents, which paper carries continuously articles of praise and laudation of said Wilfley; all to the great scandal, reproach, and disrepute of the United States court for China and of the administration of justice by the United States.

CHARGE XII. That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, unmindful of the duties of his said office and in violation of his oath of office, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct, and of high crimes and misdemeanors, in this, to wit:

That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, and while acting in such capacity, has been guilty of mal and corrupt conduct, of gross oppression and misuse of his powers as such judge; of gross partiality and favoritism to one Arthur L. Bassett, a close friend and protege of the said Wilfley, in the following matters and respects, to wit:

Specification 1. In that he, the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, as judge of the United States court for China, refused for a long time to permit any of the attorneys and counselors of the said American bar of China, although they were entitled thereto by operation of the law of the statute under which said court was constituted, as well as by the rules and practice of the Supreme Court and Federal and Territorial courts of the United States obtaining since 1790, to practice in the said United States court for China, unless they, the said members of the American bar of Shanghai, first submitted to an arbitrary and unlawful examination upon the various branches of the law, and at the same time permitted the said Arthur L. Bassett to practice in said United States court for China, both as district attorney of said court in criminal cases and as attorney for private persons and corporations in civil cases, notwithstanding said Bassett had never been admitted to said United States court for China upon motion or upon examination or otherwise and contrary to and in defiance of the rule and practice of the United States Federal, State, Territorial, and Supreme Courts.

Specification 2. That the said Judge Wilfley refused for a long time to admit any member of the American bar of Shanghai, China, to practice, except the one firm of Jernigan & Fessenden, so that the said Arthur L. Bassett acquired a large proportion of the civil practice and clientage of the other members of the American bar.

Specification 3. That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley wrongfully and unlawfully and with intent to oppress citizens of the United States who might be charged with crimes in Shanghai, China, and to make it practically impossible for them to make a proper defense, refused to allow any members of the American bar to defend American citizens so charged with crimes in said court, without said attorneys first having submitted to an unlawful and arbitrary examination before himself upon all branches of the law, while at the same time he permitted his close friend and protege, said Arthur L. Bassett, to prosecute as district attorney of said United States court for China without his, said Bassett, ever having been admitted to practice in said court upon motion, examination, or otherwise.

Specification 4. That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, as judge of the United States court for China, and while acting as such, was guilty of gross oppression and misuse of his power as said judge, and of gross favoritism, in allowing said Arthur L. Bassett, in defiance of the rules of the Supreme Court and of the Federal and State courts of the United States, to practice before said United States court for China without ever having been admitted as an attorney and counselor at law thereof; and to prosecute one S. R. Price, while at the same time denying to the law firm of Andrews & Brooks, who were at the time attorneys for S. R. Price, in the said case, the right to appear in said United States court for China, as they were entitled to by the statute creating said court and by the rule and practice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and of the Federal and Territorial courts of the United States, and defend the said Price from the charge made against him, thus depriving said Price, a citizen of the United States, from any opportunity to be defended by American lawyers of his own choice.

Specification 5. In that the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, and while acting as such, was guilty of gross favoritism to said Arthur L. Bassett, the district attorney of the United States court for China, and close friend and protégé of said Judge Wilfley, in a certain case of one Connell against one Daly; in that, at the instance of said Bassett, he ordered the appointment of a receiver and the sequestration of all of the property of said Daly without giving said Daly an opportunity to secure counsel.

Specification 6. In that the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, and while acting in that capacity, was guilty of gross favoritism to said Arthur L. Bassett, the district attorney of the United States court for China, and close friend and protégé of said Judge Wilfley, in a certain case pending before said Judge Wilfley as such judge, wherein one M. S. Friede was plaintiff and Getz Brothers & Co., defendants, and where the plaintiff, said Friede, had remained in Shanghai awaiting a trial of his case for more than five months and yet, shortly after said Friede had left China to attend to his business in some other part of the world, said Bassett, who had been retained by the defendants, made an application to said Wilfley, as judge, for an immediate trial, and said Wilfley, at the instance of said Bassett, and against the protest of the attorneys for said Friede, ordered an immediate hearing and the examination of witnesses in the absence of said Friede, and without giving his attorneys time to send for him or to ascertain in what part of the world he then was, all to the great scandal, reproach, and disrepute of the United States court for China and the administration of justice by the United States.

CHARGE XIII. That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, unmindful of the duties of his said office and in violation of his oath of office, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and of high crimes and misdemeanors in this, to wit:

That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, while holding the office of judge of the United States court for China and while acting in that capacity, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and of gross oppression and misuse of the powers of his office, in that the said Judge Wilfley unlawfully refused to allow one George F. Curtis, a member of the bar of the Supreme Court of the United States and of various State and Federal courts and of the United States consular court of Shanghai, China, to practice in said United States court for China, although entitled so to do under the statute constituting said court and under the rule and practice of the United States Supreme Court and the Federal and Territorial courts of the United States, and willfully and unlawfully convicted the said Curtis of contempt of court for attempting to practice in the United States court for China, and fined said Curtis for said pretended contempt.

That the said Wilfley well knew that the said Curtis was not guilty of any contempt of court and that said conviction and punishment was unlawful and that the said Curtis was found guilty not for the reasons set forth, but for the purpose of discrediting him, the said Curtis, and injuring his reputation as a man and lawyer, because the said Curtis was protesting against the oppressive and unlawful actions and conduct of said Wilfley as judge of the United States court for China; all to the great scandal, reproach, and disrepute of the United States court for China and of the administration of justice by the United States.

CHARGE XIV. That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, unmindful of the duties of his said office and in violation of his oath of office, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and of high crimes and misdemeanors in this, to wit:

That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, while holding the office of judge of the United States court for China and while acting in that capacity, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and of gross favoritism, oppression, and misuse of his powers as said judge in a certain case of one Cunningham against one Rogers, in that he refused to permit one George F. Curtis, a duly admitted attorney and counselor at law of the consular court of Shanghai, China, and of the United States Supreme Court and of various State and Federal courts of the United States, and entitled to practice in said United States court for China, to file a complaint for one Cunningham in a suit for damages against James L. Rogers, who was then United States consul-general for Shanghai, until the day when the said Rogers departed from Shanghai, thereby preventing the said Curtis from obtaining service of said summons upon said Rogers; all to the great scandal, reproach, and disrepute of the United States court for China and of the administration of justice by the United States.

CHARGE XV. That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, while holding the office of judge of the United States court for China, unmindful of the duties of his said office, and in violation of his oath of office, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and high crimes and misdemeanors in this, to wit:

That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, while holding the office of judge of the United States court for China, and while acting as such judge, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and of gross oppression and misuse of his powers as such judge in the case of one M. S. Friede against Getz Brothers & Co., a corporation, to recover the sum of $25,000, which case had been pending in the United States consular court of Shanghai, China, and which was transferred by operation of law to the United States court for China.

That said Friede had been in Shanghai from June, 1906, until November, 1906, awaiting a trial and hearing in his case, when he was obliged to leave in order to attend to his business in some other country.

That after said Friede left Shanghai, one Arthur L. Bassett, district attorney of the United States court for China, was retained as counsel for Getz Brothers & Co., and in the absence of said Friede made application to said Wilfley, as judge of the United States court for China, to set said case down for immediate trial.

That said Wilfley, as such judge and against the protest of counsel for said Friede, held a hearing of said case on the 7th day of January, 1907, in which he took the testimony of the witnesses for said Getz Brothers & Co., and at the instance of said Arthur L. Bassett, district attorney of the United States court for China, and acting as counsel for said Getz Brothers & Co., ordered a commission to be appointed to take the testimony of said Friede and his witnesses in the city of St. Louis, State of Missouri.

That neither said Friede or said Getz Brothers & Co. resided or had any business agents or representatives in St. Louis, Mo., and that the said Getz Brothers & Co. have their principal place of business in San Francisco, Cal., while the said Friede is engaged in business in Russia and China, and that no legal reason or excuse existed for ordering said Friede or his witnesses to appear in the said city of St. Louis, Mo.

That said Wilfley, without further notice to said Friede, on the application of said Bassett, the district attorney of his court, and counsel for Getz Brothers Co., upon receiving word that said Friede had not appeared and given testimony in St. Louis, in said Friede's absence and on the testimony taken on the 7th day of January, 1907, rendered a decision awarding the defendants, Getz Brothers & Co., the sum of $37,500 as a counterclaim against said Friede and dismissing the complaint of the said Friede; all to the great scandal, reproach, and disrepute of the United States court for China and of the administration of justice by the United States.

CHARGE XVI. That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, while holding the office of judge of the United States court for China, unmindful of the duties of said office, and in violation of his oath of office, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct, and of high crimes and misdemeanors, in this, to wit:

That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, while holding the office of judge of the United States court for China, and acting in that capacity, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and of gross oppression and misuse of his powers as such judge, in the case of one J. J. Connell against one R. F. Daly, as follows:

That said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, as judge of the United States court for China, at the special instance and request of said Arthur L. Bassett as attorney for said Connell, issued an exparte order requiring said Daly to appear before him at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of January 23, 1907, and show cause why a receiver should not be appointed for the business that said Daly was conducting as a restaurant keeper.

That at the time said order was issued no summons or complaint in any suit had been served upon said Daly and no suit against said Daly was pending in the United States court for China.

That said Daly was not served with notice of said order until 8.30 o'clock on the evening of January 22, 1907, by the United States marshal and appeared in court at 10 o'clock on the morning of January 23, 1907, and stated that he had not been served with any notice until the evening before, and that as his regular attorney, F. M. Brooks, was not allowed to appear in his behalf by Judge Wilfley, he had had no time to obtain another attorney to represent him in this matter; that no action had been begun against him to his knowledge by J. J. Connell, and the said Connell had no interest whatsoever in the business of said Daly, which he the said Daly had built up during the past two years by hard and conscientious labor, until it was now a money-making and prosperous business, and he asked that the matter be adjourned until the afternoon of January 23, or the morning of the next day, so that he, the said Daly, might have an opportunity to procure legal advice and representation to protect himself.

That said Wilfley, as judge and upon the request of Arthur L. Bassett, who was appearing as counsel for the plaintiff Connell, with willful and corrupt partiality toward said Bassett, his close friend and protégé, refused to grant any adjournment, and refused to give said Daly any time to employ counsel; and forthwith appointed as receiver for said business an employee of said J. J. Connell, and put said employee of plaintiff in possession of said business.

That although said Daly denied that said plaintiff was a partner or had any interest in said business, through the threats of said Bassett and fear of imprisonment by Judge Wilfley he was coerced into agreeing to allow said receiver to dispose of his business to a Chinese employee of said Connell, the said Daly receiving less than $1,000 for said business and being forced to expend practically all of that amount in sending his wife to the United States, she having become insane by reason of the worries and troubles brought upon her husband.

That said Daly was given no trial or opportunity to prove the charge of Connell that he was entitled to an interest in said business was false and untrue, and by reason of the above mal and corrupt conduct of said Wilfley, and the gross oppression and misuse of his power as judge of the United States court for China, and his gross partiality and favoritism shown to said Bassett, the property of said Daly was taken from him, said Daly turned into the streets practically a penniless pauper; all to the great scandal, reproach, and disrepute of the United States court for China and of the administration of justice by the United States.

CHARGE XVII. That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, unmindful of the duties of said office and in violation of his oath of office, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and of high crimes and misdemeanors in this, to wit:

That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, while holding the office of judge for the United States court for China and while acting in that capacity, has been guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and of gross oppression of his powers as said judge in that he has unlawfully and willfully refused to allow any appeals from criminal cases where he, sitting without a jury, has convicted a defendant, to be taken to the United States circuit court of appeals in California until the defendant has deposited in the United States court for China large sums of money alleged to be security for costs of the appeal, although all costs of appeal payable in said United States court for China have heretofore been paid in cash by said defendants, thereby hindering and interfering with the statutory rights of defendants in criminal cases and making it in the case of poor defendants practically impossible for them to obtain their statutory right of appeal; all to the great scandal, reproach, and disrepute of the United States court for China and of the administration of justice by the United States.

CHARGE XVIII. That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, unmindful of the duties of said office and in violation of his oath of office, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and of high crimes and misdemeanors in this, to wit:

That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, while holding the office of judge of the United States court for China and while acting in that capacity was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and of gross oppression and misuse of his powers as such judge in that a certain civil case on trial before him the said Wilfley as such judge, sitting without a jury, between a certain Chinaman and one C. A. Biddle, a citizen of the United States and the manager and principal stockholder of the Metropole Hotel, a large hotel in Shanghai, China, he, the said Wilfley, as such judge, unlawfully instructed one said Arthur L. Bassett, United States district attorney for the United States court for China, to file an information against said Biddle for obtaining money under false pretenses, and upon the trial of said Biddle on said charge the said Judge Wilfley, sitting without a jury, unjustly, unlawfully, and without warrant of law or fact, convicted said Biddle on the said pretended charge of obtaining money under false pretenses, and sentenced him to one year at hard labor in the Shanghai jail; and, further,

That upon an application to admit said Biddle to bail pending an appeal from said conviction to the United States circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit, the said Wilfley unlawfully refused to admit said Biddle to bail until he had been confined in said jail for about one month, when said Wilfley became frightened as to his arbitrary conduct by reason of the decision of the said United States circuit court of appeals in another case appealed from said Wilfley, and offered to permit said Biddle to give bail in the sum of $4,000.

That the said Biddle in the meantime had by said conviction and imprisonment been ruined in his business, calling, and reputation, and was then unable to raise said sum of $4,000, although said Biddle was at the time of his imprisonment reputed to be a man of considerable wealth, and he had a good standing and reputation in the community; and as a consequence of said gross oppression and misuse of his powers as judge of the United States court for China by said Wilfley, said Biddle was obliged to remain in said jail for over nine months, until his appeal was heard and decided by the United States court of appeals for the ninth circuit, by which decision the United States circuit court of appeals declared that the charge made by the district attorney at the instance of Judge Wilfley was wholly unfounded and was in no respect a crime, but a matter solely for adjudication in a civil suit; all to the great scandal, reproach, and disrepute of the United States court for China and of the administration of justice for the United States.

CHARGE XIX. That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, unmindful of the duties of said office and in violation of his oath of office, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and of high crimes and misdemeanors in this, to wit:

That the said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, and while acting in that capacity, was guilty of mal and corrupt conduct and gross oppression and misuse of his powers as such judge in the case of one Stuart R. Price, a citizen of the United States, and a member of the regiment of Rough Riders and a veteran of the Spanish-American war, and entitled to protection and just treatment under the laws of the United States.

That said Price has been charged by one Arthur L. Bassett, district attorney for said United States court for China, with the crime of assault with a deadly weapon.

That the evidence showed that said Price had pointed an unloaded revolver at a person who was attacking him with a large carving knife because said Price was protecting a lady from insult.

That said Price was defended by an Italian lawyer, as the American lawyers who had charge of his case were not permitted by said Wilfley to practice in said court, and one of said American lawyers was threatened by said Wilfley with a charge of contempt of court if he dared to appear in court on the trial of said Price and advise the said Italian lawyer, who knew little of the methods of American procedure.

That, contrary to the evidence in the case, said Price was convicted by said Wilfley and sentenced to a term of imprisonment at hard labor for a period of six months at the Shanghai consular jail.

That said Price, through his Italian attorney, immediately filed notice of appeal to the United States circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit, and perfected said appeal, and asked that bail be fixed pending said appeal, offering sureties for any reasonable amount or cash bail for any amount up to $10,000 pending said appeal, which appeal could not be heard for some time, as said appellate court was in California, where all the papers must be sent and the appeal argued.

That Judge Wilfley announced from the bench that having the power to make rules for his court, he would promulgate a new rule, which he then read, as follows:

"After conviction on appeal a prisoner may be admitted to or denied bail in the discretion of the court."

That said Wilfley then refused to allow bail for said Price, then a prisoner before him, and despite the perfection of his appeal and despite the fact that incarceration nullified the right of appeal given him by law and made it certain that said Price would undoubtedly undergo a long imprisonment whether his appeal was sustained or not.

That thereafter, on the 21st of February, 1907, the United States circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit issued an order to said Judge Wilfley, and said order was cabled to the United States court in China, ordering said court to admit Price to bail upon his entering into a sufficient bond in the sum of $4,000 for his appearance when required.

That said Wilfley did not obey said mandate of the United States circuit court of appeals, but the clerk of his court cabled to the said United States circuit court of appeals asking said court to reverse its mandate, and stating that bail was refused to said Price because his appeal was frivolous.

That said Price remained incarcerated in the consular prison of Shanghai until the 25th day of February, 1907, when the circuit court of appeals cabled a second order reaffirming its former order for the immediate release of said Price upon bail.

That thereafter and on or about the 6th day of November, 1907, the United States circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit reversed the unlawful and illegal conviction of said Price by the said Judge Wilfley.

All of which mal and corrupt conduct by said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, and gross oppression and misuse of his powers as such judge were high crimes and misdemeanors and all to the great scandal, reproach, and disrepute of the United States court for China and the administration of justice by the United States.

Mr. WALDO. Mr. Speaker, I now offer the following privileged resolution and ask that it be read at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WALDO] offers a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized and directed to investigate and report upon the charges of official misconduct of Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, and upon the charges of mal and corrupt conduct, and of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, made against said Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, and to report to the House the result of such investigation, with the testimony, and whether articles of impeachment for mal and corrupt conduct and high crimes and misdemeanors in office shall be adopted by the House.

And in reference to this investigation the said committee or subcommitee is hereby authorized and empowered to sit at such times and places as may suit its conveniences, to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, take testimony, and to employ a clerk and stenographers to report its hearings, and to have the same printed, to send a subcommittee whenever or wherever it may be necessary to take testimony for the purpose of said investigation and for the use of said committee. And the said subcommittee while so employed, either within or without the United States, shall have the same powers in respect to obtaining testimony and taking proof thereof as are hereby given to said Committee on the Judiciary, with a sergeant-at-arms, by himself or deputy, who shall serve the processes of said committee and subcommittee and execute its orders, and shall attend the sittings of the same as ordered and directed thereby. And that the expense of such investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. WALDO. Mr. Speaker, unless there is some objection, I have nothing to say.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest to my colleague that this resolution proposes on the face of it, and on the strength of this memorial that is presented to Congress, to authorize the Committee on the Judiciary to appoint a subcommittee to go to China or anywhere else and take evidence in this case. Now, it seems to me, and I suggest to my colleague, that it would be well to refer this resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report back a resolution, say within ten days, in order not to delay the matter, and let them look into the memorial and see whether a prima facie case is made out and report a suitable resolution.

Mr. WALDO. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. PAYNE. Then I suggest to take that course.

Mr. WALDO. I move, then, that this resolution and the articles be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to report back by resolution within ten days what, if any, proceedings should be taken.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WALDO] moves to refer the whole matter to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report to the House within ten days, by resolution or otherwise, what, if any, proceedings should be taken by the House. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Saturday of this week be set aside for the consideration of District business in lieu of to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that Saturday of this week be set apart for business of the District Committee in lieu of to-day. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DEATH OF HON. ASBURY C. LATIMER.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, the House has been officially informed by communication from the Senate of the death of Hon. ASBURY C. LATIMER, junior Senator from the State of South Carolina, who departed this life at Providence Hospital, in this city, at 9.15 o'clock this morning. At some future time I will ask the House to set apart a day at which time proper tribute can be paid to the life, character, and public services of South Carolina's distinguished son. I ask, Mr. Speaker, the adoption of the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. ASBURY C. LATIMER, late a Senator of the United States from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That a committee of nineteen Members of the House, with such members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late ASBURY C. LATIMER the House of Representatives do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the first three resolutions.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following committee:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FINLEY, Mr. LEVER, Mr. PATTERSON, Mr. ELLERBE, Mr. LEGARE, Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina, Mr. AIKEN, Mr. BENNET of New York,

Mr. BURNETT, Mr. COOK of Colorado, Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. RODENBERG, Mr. HINSHAW, Mr. POLLARD, Mr. LEE, Mr. DE ARMOND, Mr. FAIRCHILD, Mr. WEBB and Mr. KÜSTERMANN.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the last resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

MARKING OF GRAVES OF CONFEDERATE SOLDIERS.

Mr. FORAKER. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 138) to continue in full force and effect an act entitled "An act to provide for the appropriate marking of the graves of the soldiers and sailors of the Confederate army and navy who died in northern prisons and were buried near the prisons where they died, and for other purposes," to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SURVEY OF PROVIDENCE RIVER AND HARBOR, RHODE ISLAND.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to report back favorably without amendment the concurrent resolution providing for a survey of Providence River and Harbor, Rhode Island, and I call the attention of the senior Senator from Rhode Island to it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask to have the resolution, to which there will be no objection, put upon its passage.

The concurrent resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a survey to be made of Providence River and Harbor between Kettle Point, Rhode Island, and Gaspee Point, Rhode Island, with a view to widening and straightening the channel and dredging the same to a depth of 25 feet at mean low water, and submit a plan and estimate for such improvements.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. DOLLIVER on the 18th instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had on bills or other matters pending before said committee and to have the same printed for the use of the committee, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

CANAL AT FALLS OF WILLAMETTE RIVER, OREGON.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. FULTON on the 3d instant, reported it without amendment:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to cause such survey and examination to be made of the existing canal and locks at the Falls of the Willamette River at Oregon City, Oreg., as may be necessary to ascertain what sum of money, at present prices of labor and material, should be appropriated by Congress, in addition to the appropriation already made by the State of Oregon therefor, to enable the Government to acquire said canal and locks and properly repair the same.

Mr. FULTON. The concurrent resolution being local in its nature and character, I ask for its present consideration.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF MISSOURI RIVER, KANSAS.

Mr. DEPEW, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. CURTIS on the 13th instant, reported it without amendment:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to submit an estimate to Congress as to the cost of improvements and works necessary to restore the Missouri River to its proper channel at the city of Atchison, in the State of Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

HITCHMAN COAL AND COKE COMPANY V. JOHN MITCHELL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Are there further reports of standing or select committees?

Mr. CULBERSON. Before passing from that order I ask the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], the chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, if there has yet been any report on resolution No. 81, respecting the issuance of a preliminary injunction by the United States district judge for one of the districts of West Virginia? The resolution was referred to that committee several weeks ago.

Mr. KEAN. If the Senator will withhold his request for a moment, I have sent to the committee room to get the papers.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not mean any discourtesy to the chairman or to the committee, but it occurs to me that there has been ample time to consider the resolution and make some character of report with reference to it.

Mr. KEAN. I will say to the Senator from Texas that I am ready to report upon it at any moment he desires. I have sent for the papers.

Mr. CULBERSON. I would be glad to have some character of report from the committee at an early day, now or at such time as the committee sees proper to report. I do not want it delayed unnecessarily. If there is any reason why the committee desires further time to consider this matter, I have no objection to deferring it; but if it is the mere purpose, which I will not assume at all is the case, to bury the resolution in the committee, then probably some action may be taken in the Chamber.

Mr. KEAN. I have no such desire, Mr. President, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am sure of that; I have said that I would not assume that there was any such purpose, but if the Senator or the committee for any reason should desire further time to consider the matter and will so state, I have no objection to its being deferred until such time as may be reasonable. However, it occurs to me that there has been ample time to give the resolution full consideration, and that some character of report ought to have been made upon it.

Mr. KEAN. What is the Senator's wish about it?

Mr. CULBERSON. The wish of the Senator from Texas is to know whether or not a report on the resolution may be expected from the committee at an early day.

Mr. KEAN. I can assure the Senator that there will be one.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Bills and joint resolutions are in order.

Mr. FORAKER. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the post-office appropriation bill. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and printed.

Mr. CULBERSON. May I ask that the amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio be read?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment, as requested by the Senator from Texas, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

An amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. FORAKER to the bill (H. R. 18347) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes. Insert the following proviso:

Provided, That from and after July 1, 1908, railway postal clerks shall be paid their actual and necessary traveling expenses, not to exceed $2 per day, while away from the terminal where their runs, or series of runs, begins and ends, when actually on duty, such expenses to be paid under the direction of the Postmaster-General; but in no case shall a greater sum be paid a clerk than he shows has actually been expended by him; and the sum of ——— dollars is hereby appropriated to carry the provisions of this act into effect.

Mr. CULBERSON. I misconceived the amendment. I thought it had reference to the prohibition of the payment of salaries of postmasters where the nomination had been rejected by the Senate. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORAKER. No; that will come later.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and printed.

Mr. GAMBLE submitted an amendment proposing to make the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard a standing committee of the Senate, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment relative to the Office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salaries of two translators in the Office of Naval Intelligence, Navy Department, from $1,400 each to $2,100 each, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DICK submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of the foreman and captain of the watch at the Naval Observatory, Washington, D. C., from $1,000 to $1,200, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMOOT submitted an amendment relative to certain changes in the personnel of the Office of the Secretary of the Interior, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BULKELEY submitted an amendment relative to an increase in the pay of all clerks to committees of the Senate, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAPP submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to pay $1,000 to the treasurer of the executive committee of the White Earth bands of Chippewa Indians, in Minnesota, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of the Senate keeper of stationery from $2,220 to $2,500, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. TELLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURNHAM submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which were referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

RURAL FREE DELIVERY.

On motion of Mr. BURNHAM, it was—

Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Post-Office Department 10,000 copies of Senate bill No. 5122, Sixtieth Congress, first session, "To provide a rural delivery parcel-post for merchandise and other articles mailed on rural delivery routes, and for other purposes."

TRANSPORTATION FACILITIES.

On motion of Mr. CULLOM, it was—

Ordered, That 2,500 additional copies of Senate Document, Sixtieth Congress, first session, "Prompt furnishing of transportation facilities," etc., be printed.

ADVANCEMENT OF INSTRUCTION IN AGRICULTURE.

On motion of Mr. BURKETT, it was—

Ordered, That the bill (S. 3392) to provide for the advancement of instruction in agriculture, manual training, and home economics in the State normal schools of the United States be reprinted.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON DEPARTMENT METHODS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of the Congress a report by the Committee on Department Methods on the subject of superannuation in the classified civil service; also a draft of a proposed bill which provides for the payment of annuities to employees upon retirement.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 21, 1908.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 9079. An act to make Port Arthur, in the State of Texas, a port of delivery in the customs collection district of Sabine, with the privilege of immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT RICE, MINN.

Mr. CLAPP. Day before yesterday the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] reported back favorably, from the Committee on Commerce, the bill (H. R. 12401) to legalize a bridge across the Mississippi River at Rice, Minn., and the bill was placed on the Calendar. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GROUNDS FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, some days ago I presented a concurrent resolution which was laid on the table subject to call. I ask to have it now considered, and I desire to change it so as to make it a simple Senate resolution, the bill to which it applies being now before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate concurrent resolution No. 39, by Mr. GALLINGER, relative to the purchase of certain blocks and parcels of land south of Pennsylvania avenue.

Mr. GALLINGER. The resolution has been read. Let it be modified so as to make it a Senate resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. FRYE. The resolution has not been read.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was read the other day.

Mr. CLAPP. Let the resolution be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read by the Secretary at the request of the Senator from Minnesota.

The resolution as modified was read and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to ascertain the lowest purchase price of blocks numbered 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 292, 293, 294, 295, 349, 350, 380, 381, 382, 461, 575, 576, reservation A, reservation B, reservation C, reservation D, reservation 12, according to the official plat of the city of Washington, not already owned in whole or in part by the Government of the United States, report to be made to Congress at the earliest practicable day, the proposed price of the land and the proposed price of the improvements thereon being separately stated in each case.

OCEAN MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, by reference to the Calendar it will be observed that Thursday, February 20, was fixed by unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 28) to amend the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports and to promote commerce." Certain Senators have asked me, two of whom are absent from the city in pursuance of the order of the Senate, to let the measure go over until Monday next. For the purpose of carrying out their wishes, I ask unanimous consent that the date may be changed, making it Monday next at the conclusion of the morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the unanimous-consent agreement by which Senate bill 28 was made the special order for this morning after the close of the morning business be modified, and that the bill be made the special order after the routine morning business closes on Monday the 24th instant. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that immediately after the Senator from New Hampshire concludes his remarks on Monday next I shall make some remarks on the same subject.

INQUIRY AS TO CERTAIN WESTERN LAND GRANTS.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, some days ago I called up the joint resolution (S. R. 48) instructing the Attorney-General to institute certain suits, etc. At that time there was some objections made to its consideration, but I am advised that those who then objected, after an examination of the joint resolution, do not wish to further object. The joint resolution simply authorizes the Attorney-General to institute such suits or take such proceedings as he shall ascertain and deem to be necessary in order to determine whether certain land-grant companies have complied with the conditions enacted by Congress. I therefore ask that the joint resolution may be now taken up and put on its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution, which will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. FULTON. It has been read.

Mr. KEAN. Let it be read again.

Mr. FULTON. Very well.

The Secretary proceeded to read the joint resolution.

Mr. FULTON. The preamble is no part of the joint resolution as reported by the committee, and unless the Senator from New Jersey desires that the preamble shall be read it may be omitted.

Mr. KEAN. I was going to move to strike out the preamble.

Mr. FULTON. The Committee on the Judiciary has reported a substitute without any preamble, and therefore it seems to me unnecessary to read the preamble.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution as reported by the committee.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on the Judiciary report to strike out all after the resolving clause and in lieu thereof to insert:

That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to institute and prosecute any and all suits in equity, actions at law, and other proceedings which he may deem adequate and appropriate to enforce any and all rights and remedies of the United States of America in any manner arising or growing out of or pertaining to either or any of the following-described acts of Congress, to wit: "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Central Pacific Railroad in California to Portland, in Oregon," approved July 25, 1866, as amended by the acts approved June 25, 1868, and April 10, 1869; also "An act granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military wagon road from the navigable waters of Coos Bay to Roseburg, in said State," approved March 3, 1869; also "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in the State of Oregon," approved May 4, 1870, including all rights and remedies in any manner relating to the lands, or any part thereof, granted by either or any of said acts; and in and by any and all such suits, actions, or proceedings the Attorney-General shall, in such manner as he shall deem appropriate, assert all rights and remedies existing in favor of the United States relating to the subject of such suits, actions, and proceedings, including the claim on behalf of the United States that the lands granted by each of said acts respectively, or any part thereof, have been and are forfeited to the United States by reason of any breaches or violations of any of the terms or conditions of either or any of said acts which may be alleged and established in any such suits, actions, or proceedings; it not being intended hereby to determine the right of the United States to any such forfeiture or forfeitures, but it being intended to fully authorize the Attorney-General in and by such suits, actions, or proceedings to assert on behalf of the United States and the court or courts before which such suits, actions, or proceedings may be instituted or pending to ascertain, consider, and adjudicate the claim and right of the United States to such forfeiture or forfeitures, and if found to enforce the same.

Resolved further, That the authority and direction hereinbefore given shall extend to any and all suits, actions, or proceedings which may be instituted or pending under the authority of the Attorney-General at the time of the adoption and approval hereof.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, the Secretary has read the joint resolution as if the committee had recommended that the original joint resolution should be amended by striking out all after the resolving clause. That would have been a very good report to have made; I think, indeed, better than the report that was made; but, as a matter of fact, the record shows that the amendment reported by the committee is a substitute. Therefore I ask that the substitute be adopted instead of the original joint resolution. The substitute omits the preamble.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The preamble can be disagreed to after the joint resolution itself has been acted upon. The question is on the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, which has been reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was rejected.

THE UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, which I ask to have read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from California will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That it should be the policy of this Government, while not adopting a continuous programme fixing the number of naval vessels of any type to be built in future years, to maintain the present relative position in comparison with the navies of the other great powers.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, before asking the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with the permission of the Senate, I desire to submit some remarks bearing upon the subject to which it pertains.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from California.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, the departure of a United States battle-ship fleet to the Pacific has called attention to our Navy as perhaps no other possible event could have done. Sixteen armored vessels, ranging from 11,525 to 16,000 tons, make a formidable sea force which would command respect from any nation in time of trouble. But there is, happily, no chance of international difficulties which would call for the dispatch of such a fighting force to any part of the world. The simple fact is that, as our Navy has become large enough for the purpose, it has been possible to form a homogeneous fleet of fighting ships and give it, by a long voyage, a chance to solve important tactical problems and afford practice which is invaluable to the proper management of a large sea force. It is also important to establish the fact that our fleets are free from any local tie or dependence, and that perfect mobility is possible. So it is determined to have a regular interchange of vessels between the Atlantic and Pacific, with occasional concentration into large fleets under one general command. But besides the great benefit to be derived from the experiences of the long voyage by both officers and men is the lasting effect it will have in promoting good relations between this country and the South American States which have been visited by the fleet. The cordiality between the United States and the South American republics has been demonstrated by the character of the receptions given to our sailors, and the bonds of friendship have thereby been strengthened. This was one of the objects of the long voyage, and alone would justify the movement.

A BIG FLEET IN THE PACIFIC.

The fleet which is now making its way up the west coast of South America consists of sixteen battle ships aggregating 223,066 tons displacement, carrying sixteen 13-inch breech-loading rifled guns, forty-eight 12-inch, and eighty 8-inch, besides secondary batteries of 5 and 6 inch rapid-fire guns. The ships are manned by about 14,000 men. The six torpedo-boat destroyers, which have preceded the fleet, add to its effective force very materially. When Rear-Admiral Evans's squadron reaches San Francisco it will be in touch with other vessels of the United States and, joining with them, will form a strong fleet. There are already on the Pacific coast two battle ships, the Nebraska and Wisconsin, one in commission and the other ready for commission in April, aggregating 26,500 tons. There are also eight armored cruisers in commission, aggregating 111,080 tons; nine protected cruisers, aggregating 49,726 tons, five now in commission, one to be ready in March, and three in July. There are also three torpedo boats, five destroyers, and two submarines. On the Asiatic station we have four more protected cruisers, aggregating 12,800 tons, and five torpedo-boat destroyers. Harbor-defense vessels and unprotected cruisers are disregarded in this enumeration of sea strength, which really means fighting strength on the high seas.

The Pacific fleet, when completed by the arrival of the vessels now on the way, will consist of eighteen battle ships, eight armored cruisers, thirteen protected cruisers, thirteen torpedo-boat destroyers, five torpedo boats, and two submarines. The battle ships and cruisers alone aggregate 423,172 tons, which shows that ours will be by far the most powerful fleet in the Pacific, as the effective forces of Japan, the only other naval power bordering on that ocean, including coast-defense vessels, unprotected cruisers, torpedo boats, destroyers, and submarines, aggregate 374,701 tons, according to latest figures. The vessels of the Pacific fleet, when the battle ships arrive in that ocean, will carry twenty 13-inch rifles, fifty-two 12-inch, and one hundred and twenty-four 8-inch guns, besides several hundred 5 and 6 inch rapid-fire guns. Thus the Pacific fleet will be imposing in the dignity of its great strength.

NATIONAL PRIDE IN OUR NAVY.

The Navy of the United States is one branch of the public service in which the people have a just pride. They also have a direct interest in it, for there is no section of the United States that has not a representative on the decks of our ships of war. Each Senator and each Congressman has the privilege of two appointments to the Naval Academy, each vacancy, upon the graduation of a cadet, to be filled by other appointments, so that there are constantly at Annapolis two cadets appointed through each Member of the two Houses of Congress. Thus every section of the country is reached, and every class of our citizens is represented in the Navy. Cadets do not come from the maritime States alone; the greater number come from the farms and manufacturing towns of the interior. Farmers' boys have been among the most brilliant of our naval men. The sons of mechanics have made records of which we are all proud. So the entire country is knit together in its common interest in our Navy, which represents the people of all sections and of all classes. In addition, the President has twenty appointments per year to Annapolis, and selects the sons of naval officers, thus giving to the service the advantages of the naval spirit which is characteristic of the families of those whose lives have been devoted to the Navy and its work.

The Navy is non-sectarian in the strictest sense, and politics is virtually unknown in the service; and so single-minded in this respect are men of all grades that the highest officers believe that by law no one under the naval flag should even be permitted to vote. In their opinion the sole duty of officers and men is to defend on the sea the honor of our country—not to engage on shore in ballot battles between political parties and rival candidates for civil offices.

A GLORIOUS RECORD.

From the time when a few fighting ships were sent out during the Revolution against the great navy of England to the present time there has been an unbroken record of bravery, self-sacrifice, and patriotism which has made the naval establishment a model of efficiency. The Continental navy was, from the nature of the circumstances, an experiment, and though it was not a formidable factor in the war, it covered itself with glory and caused the American flag on the high seas to be respected. The American-built frigate Alliance came out of the war with a brilliant reputation; but nearly all the other Continental vessels were destroyed or captured.

John Paul Jones won his most famous victory in a French-built ship, the Bon Homme Richard. The 30 Continental cruisers of 1776 had shrunk to 9 in 1781, carrying all together only 164 guns. But of privateers—the irregular navy of the Colonies—there were 449, carrying 6,735 guns, and these scourges of the sea did much to bring England to terms. In them were educated the masters and men who played so great a part in the naval wars which were to follow.

Soon after the adoption of the Constitution and the establishment of the Federal Government the question of a navy was brought prominently forward by reason of the attacks of the Barbary coast pirates on American shipping. Congress had pleaded that to authorize a fleet capable of protecting our commerce would be to create a menace to our Republican institutions, and recommended that, instead, the pirates be bought off, and an attempt to do this was actually made in the treaty with the Dey of Algiers, by which the United States bound itself to pay him $1,000,000 in money, besides presents, which latter took the form of the magnificent frigate Crescent, built at Portsmouth, N. H. But this exhibition of faint-heartedness on the part of Congress was condemned by Washington, who then laid down the sound maxim that "to secure respect to a neutral flag requires a naval force organized and ready to vindicate it from insult and aggression." A navy was determined on, and the first fighting ship of the United States was the Ganges, an old-fashioned, deep-waisted merchantman, purchased and refitted as a man-of-war, with twenty-four guns. Under the spur of Washington, Congress authorized the construction of six frigates, one of which, the Constellation, became later famed for her capture of the French frigate Insurgent, while the Constitution captured the Guerriere. And in the war which unexpectedly sprang up with France American ships of war performed most notable feats of arms, which placed the Navy of the United States in the van of the navies of the world.

But with the occasion for use lacking, our naval vessels fast diminished in number, and, as on previous occasions, it required the stimulus of impending attack to awaken the nation to the necessity for a navy. The war of 1812 found us with not a single two-deck man-of-war afloat and only six serviceable frigates. Jefferson and his party had opposed line-of-battle ships, so that when war was declared we had only seventeen national vessels, not one of first class in power or size, mounting 442 guns, and carrying 5,000 men, to oppose a thousand ships, 27,000 guns, and 150,000 seamen of England. But our Navy, inadequate as it was, covered itself with glory, and England found herself no match, ship for ship, for the United States cruisers. In twelve single-ship actions we won ten. No brighter pages of naval history exist than those which chronicle the victories of the Constitution over the Guerriere, the Java, the Cayane, and the Levant; of the United States over the Macedonian; of the Hornet over the Peacock; of the Wasp over the Frolic and Reindeer; of the great victories on Lakes Erie and Champlain, and the heroic defense of the Essex by David Porter, with Farragut as midshipman, against the combined attack of the Phœbe and the Cherub. But notwithstanding all this valor, all this burning patriotism which made a United States vessel superior as a fighter to any other fighting vessel then afloat, nearly all of our frigates and sloops were finally blockaded by overwhelming squadrons simply because we had no line-of-battle ships. For lack of heavy ships of the line the achievements of our sailors went for naught. The last frigate to run the gantlet of the blockade was the President, and she was defeated and captured by a hostile fleet before she cleared the land.

But the loss of the national fleet did not end the warfare by sea, for the American privateer was abroad and made such havoc with the commerce of Great Britain that her merchants cried for quarter. They were fighters which did not single out defenseless merchant ships. They constantly sought British privateers, armed like themselves, and vanquished them. They did not hesitate to attack ships of the royal navy. The cruiser St. Lawrence was captured by the famous American brig Chasseur, and there are numerous other instances where American merchant vessels defeated and captured ships flying the colors of the King.

THE NAVY IN THE CIVIL WAR.

But with peace the United States Navy was again neglected, and it required the crisis of the civil war to bring about a full realization of its importance. When war began the United States Navy consisted of only 30 steam ships of war, with about twice as many obsolete sailing vessels, with 1,450 officers and 7,600 seamen. Before the war ended this force was expanded to 600 steamers, with 9,000 officers and 51,000 men. Although the Government began to build new war vessels on the commencement of hostilities, the exigencies of the situation demanded a fleet for immediate operation, and the best that could be done was to purchase merchant steamers and transform them into ships of war. It was these remodeled vessels that comprised the bulk of our blockading squadron, manned by captains and seamen from the merchant marine, which educated and had available the finest body of sailors on the globe. Without these men, trained on American vessels in time of peace, the North could not have created and maintained the effective fleets that swarmed along the southern coasts. During the war there were few opportunities for battles between ships of the contestants. The most notable was that between the Monitor and the Merrimac, which changed at once and finally the character of war-ship construction. Another encounter which will never be forgotten was that between the Kearsarge and the Alabama, and it is of interest at this time to note that the notorious commerce destroyer of the Confederacy was built in England through the efforts of Capt. James D. Bulloch, Confederate naval agent, who was the uncle of one of the most distinguished men our country has produced. The trouble which began to brew between the United States and England on account of the devastation caused by this English-manned and English-built Confederate privateer, caused the United States to prepare for conflict by building commerce destroyers for use against British commerce. The Wampanoag was one of the ships so built, and as it and others built on the same model outclassed any and all vessels under the English flag in speed and endurance, they exercised no little influence in inducing the British Government to submit the Alabama matter to arbitration. There was then no vessel in the British navy that could steam 14 knots; the Wampanoag and her sisters made an average of 17 knots, which could easily be maintained across the Atlantic.

PITIABLE REDUCTION OF SEA POWER.

At the close of the civil war the United States Navy was undoubtedly the most powerful in the world, for it had a large fleet of vessels, which were manned by 50,000 of the best seamen on salt water, all of whom were well disciplined and seasoned by long service, and ready to fight anything that sailed the seas. But this fleet, when reduced after the war to a peace footing, consisted mainly of wooden ships, and only wooden ships, with two exceptions, were found therein for nearly twenty years. But among these structures of oak there were some whose names will never be forgotten—notably the Hartford, which bore Farragut into Mobile Bay. All of the vessels of the Navy at that time used sail power, to which steam was simply auxiliary. And the armament was, to us as we look back, as primitive as were the means of propulsion. For instance, the glorious Hartford was only 225 feet long (the same length as the Mayflower, the President's dispatch boat), 44 feet beam, drawing 18⅓ feet of water, with a displacement of 2,900 tons. Her coal capacity was 241 tons, horsepower 940, and speed 10 knots an hour. Her armament was one 8-inch, muzzle-loading rifle (converted from smoothbore) and twelve 9-inch smoothbores. The latest vessel constructed of this type was the Trenton, 3,900 tons and 2,813 horsepower, capable of making 12⅓ knots, with a coal capacity of 350 tons. Her battery consisted of ten 8-inch muzzle-loading rifles converted from smoothbores.

When the United States Navy became reduced to twenty-three such vessels as above—exclusive of a few single-turreted monitors—the question began to be asked, "Of what good is it?" The Old World nations, alive to the ideas inspired by the Monitor of Ericsson, were building new navies on plans which rendered our own as useless as paper boats. In case of trouble with any European power we should, we began to realize, be helpless. And as for asserting with any vigor the Monroe doctrine, that would be out of the question. Naval officers began to feel humiliated at the condition of the service, for the time had arrived when there could be found no excuse. Our Navy had, in fact, become practically the standard of inefficiency—not because of its personnel, but by reason of the obsolete type of its vessels and armament and the scanty number of armed ships carrying the American flag. Little Chile, with two or three modern fighting machines, could easily become an actual menace to our country, for we had nothing with which to oppose them.

THE MAN BEHIND THE GUN.

But though the old Navy was inefficient as far as its vessels and their armament were concerned, its officers and its seamen maintained the best traditions of the service, and were ready to fight the world with their smoothbores against modern rifles. That was the spirit exhibited by the last remnant of the old Navy before its glorious extinction in the harbor of Apia. The wooden Trenton and Vandalia and the little Nipsic were ready and anxious to come to close quarters with the modern German war ships Adler, Eber, and Olga, and a battle royal would probable have been fought between these representatives of the new and the old navies of the world had it not been for the hurricane that brought destruction to them all. And as the Trenton strained at her anchors while drifting slowly but surely on the fatal reef there was an exhibition of coolness and bravery of the kind that has always characterized our Navy. Another modern war ship, the British Calliope, of then tremendous horsepower, fought her way out of the crowded harbor in the face of the hurricane at the rate of a knot and a half an hour. As she passed the Trenton, whose crew knew that they would soon be cast upon the reef, every man, headed by the gallant Admiral Kimberly, rushed to some point of vantage—rail, shrouds, yardarms, or whatnot—and sent up cheer upon cheer for the courageous Englishman who dared to run his ship into the teeth of the hurricane and who succeeded in beating the elements because he was the stronger. And with such men on board, the last vessels of the old Navy of the United States went to their doom, and their bones, with those of scores of the brave sailors who trod their decks, now lie amid the coral reefs of beautiful Samoa.

I remember, being president of the chamber of commerce of San Francisco, when Admiral Kimberly and the surviving men from that fleet reached San Francisco. The people of that great metropolis of the Pacific coast turned out en masse to give them a reception and applaud them for their gallant deeds and valor on that great and eventful occasion.

SPIRIT OF THE AMERICAN NAVY.

At every period in the history of the United States Navy there has been some notable example of the spirit of the men who sailed and manned the vessels. When John Paul Jones, on the deck of the sinking Bon Homme Richard, was asked if he had surrendered, his answer was, "I have not begun to fight yet."

In the Straits of Gibraltar, Commodore Preble, in the famed Constitution, hailed one dark night a ship that gave an evasive answer and then tried to get the weather gauge.

"I hail you for the last time," said the commodore. "If you don't answer I'll fire. What ship is that?"

"His Britannic Majesty's 84-gun ship-of-the-line Donegal. Send a boat aboard."

"This is the United States 44-gun ship Constitution, Capt. Edward Preble," returned the commodore, "and I'll be d—d if I send a boat on board any ship. Blow your matches boys."

Preble had no need to fire, for the stranger stood off.

Lawrence in the Chesapeake, manned by a green crew, and shattered by the shots of the Shannon, gave as his last order before being carried below, "Don't give up the ship. Never strike the colors. They shall wave while I live."

Farragut, on the Hartford, going into Mobile Bay, seeing the Brooklyn falter and learning that she feared torpedoes, trumpeted:

"Damn the torpedoes. Four bells. Captain Drayton, go ahead; Jouett, full speed."

And the new Navy, in its first action with an enemy, showed that the spirit of 1776, of 1812, and of 1861–1864 was still alive and ready to make itself manifest at any moment. Dewey, in Manila Bay, after his famous order: "You may fire when you are ready, Gridley," was to show anew the spirit of Commodore Perry when he fell in with the insolent Englishman. In this case the insolent offender was a German, who, forgetful of the character of American naval men, had manifested too great a sympathy for our enemies and had taken not only pains to aid them, but had endeavored to thwart us. With diplomatic patience Dewey endured it all until the proper time arrived, and then sent his flag lieutenant to Rear-Admiral Von Diedrich, to call to his attention his extraordinary disregard of the usual courtesies of naval intercourse and to notify him that "If he wants to fight, he can have it right now." And the German rear-admiral knew that he would have a fight on his hands that would cost him dear, and further annoyance ceased.

Thus was the new Navy shown to be the worthy descendant of the old, maintaining the same traditions of gallantry, bravery, and force, and ready to uphold the national honor at all times and in all places. Such is the spirit abroad to-day in the fleet, and so we are assured that no fighting vessels in the world are in better hands.

IN A DEFENSELESS CONDITION.

Ericsson's little Monitor of the civil war indicated a change in the character of fighting vessels which was to be revolutionary and which was to cause all the maritime nations to cast aside the old wooden ships and to build of iron and steel on entirely different models. After the battle with the Merrimac in Hampton Roads, the London Times stated that whereas Great Britain, previous to the encounter, had available for immediate service 149 first-class war vessels, it had only two "that it would not be madness to trust to an engagement with that little Monitor." England at once began the construction of a new navy on the lines of the new fighting machine, but the United States, wearied by the long conflict it had just gone through, was naturally indisposed to rush immediately into further huge expenditures for the creation of a new fleet of battle ships, particularly as such construction would be in a great measure experimental. In consequence the ships of the old Navy were retained in service, and iron construction was attempted in only three vessels of little over 1,000 tons displacement, while old cast-iron, smoothbore cannon were converted into rifled muzzle-loaders. The few other small vessels that were built were of wood, with auxiliary steam power, of low speed, and a coal capacity ranging from 150 to 350 tons.

It may be fairly claimed that such vessels were simply makeshifts, pending the determination of fundamental principles which should govern in the construction of modern ships of war. But as naval architecture and armament were advancing with rapid strides abroad, the time soon came when we saw ourselves so far deficient in means of naval defense that the country was awakened to the danger of the continuance of such conditions, and a new and modern navy was seen to be an absolute necessity, and the Administration and Congress went to work with a will to provide adequate means of protection against the sea power of other nations. In 1879, just before this work was begun, the United States had only five steam vessels classed as first-rates, but which were obsolete and useless as men-of-war; only nine second-rates in condition for sea duty; only fifteen third-rates available for naval duty; six fourth-rates, none of any value whatever for war purposes; only five sailing vessels that could navigate the sea, and fourteen ironclads that might serve in some slight degree for coast and harbor defense. In the entire Navy there was not a single high-power, long-range rifled gun.

BEGINNING OF THE NEW NAVY.

It was high time, therefore, for radical action to be taken when President Arthur, in his first annual message, stated that "every consideration of national safety, economy, and honor imperatively demands a thorough rehabilitation of the Navy." Secretary of the Navy Hunt reenforced this advice of the President and called attention to the fact that our right of way across the Isthmus of Panama, becoming more and more important with the rapid growth of the Pacific coast, should be maintained against any and all foreign powers. An advisory board had been appointed which gave the subject of naval increase its attention and had recommended that thirty-eight unarmored cruisers should be built—eighteen of wood and twenty of steel—besides five steel rams and twenty torpedo boats. The designation of the material for construction was evidently a compromise, for there was great divergence of opinion, even among the naval experts on the board, as to the advisability of steel. Strange as it may now seem, the minority advocated iron instead of steel, for the reason that steel is only a high quality of iron, made at greatly increased cost, which cost to the Government would be excessive for the reason that there would have to be established plants for its manufacture and workmen would have to be educated to their use. Moreover, there was no assurance that contracts would not fall into the hands of middlemen who would import the necessary steel and charge exorbitant prices based on the cost of establishing here manufactories capable of turning out like products. But the majority held a different view and advocated the use of steel because the demand by the Government would give such an impetus to steel manufacture that we should soon have established plants capable of producing all the steel necessary for our entire domestic consumption, and for the further reason that "a bold and decided step should be taken to win back our former prestige as the best shipbuilders of the world." That the majority was right is evident from the fact that the United States is now the greatest producer of steel in the world, sending its products to every country under the sun. And the building of the new Navy has had a very potent influence in bringing about the development of the greatest industry on the globe. The question as to steel in naval construction was raised for a year or two, and in 1882 the chairman of the House Committee on Naval Affairs presented a report in which steel was recommended as the only proper material for the construction of vessels of war. The committee was not ready to go so far as the advisory board recommended, and proposed that six cruisers and one ram be built. Congress, however, did not feel disposed to adopt this limited programme, and by the act of August 5, 1882, it authorized the construction of two steel cruisers of full sail and steam power, one between 5,000 and 6,000 tons and one between 4,000 and 4,300 tons.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from California permit me?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. What is the displacement of our largest battle ship to-day?

Mr. PERKINS. The new ships we are building will have a displacement of 20,000 tons.

Mr. SCOTT. Four times the size.

Mr. PERKINS. Nearly five times. It shows what the evolution of the Navy has been; the same as it has been with the merchant marine. We are a progressive people. The best index of what we have accomplished is the development of our steel manufactures and the building of these ships.

THE WHITE SQUADRON.

This was the act which may be said to have brought the new Navy into existence, although no appropriation was made for carrying the act into effect. A second advisory board, created by this act, advised that the larger vessel be not built, on the ground that so large a ship was not then necessary. The board suggested five vessels, one of 4,000 tons, three of 2,500 tons, to be built of steel, and one iron dispatch boat of about 1,500 tons. At the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress an act was passed and approved March 3, 1883, authorizing the construction of the vessels recommended by the board, with the exception of one of the smaller steel cruisers. Bids were invited from all American shipbuilders, and the ships built under the act were the Chicago, Boston, Atlanta, and Dolphin.

These, the first vessels of the new Navy, were, respectively, of 5,000 tons, 3,035 tons, 3,000 tons, and 1,486 tons displacement.

The three first were protected cruisers, the last a dispatch boat. The Chicago was of 18-knot speed, the other two cruisers of 15.60 knots, and the Dolphin of 15.50 knots. The cost of hull and machinery was, respectively, $889,000, $619,000, $617,000, and $315,000. The Chicago had an indicated horsepower of 5,000 and bunker capacity of 950 tons of coal. Her battery consisted of four 8-inch breech-loading guns in half turrets and eight 6-inch and two 5-inch breechloaders on the main deck. The Boston and Atlanta had 3,482 horsepower, 580 tons bunker capacity, and batteries composed of two 8-inch breechloaders and six 6-inch guns. The Dolphin has the distinction of being the first vessel, whether for naval or commercial purposes, built entirely of steel of domestic production. The rolled-steel plating of which she was built was the best in the world, and its character was the result of the impetus given to the steel industry by the policy of building a new and modern Navy. The Advisory Board prepared a set of strict regulations governing the acceptance of steel for the new ships, and the necessity for manufacturers to live up to the standard resulted in the production of better steel ship plates than could be made anywhere abroad. Before the work on the new vessels began steel was held at 8½ cents per pound, but it immediately dropped to 4½ cents, and this reduction, as well as the high quality of the material, caused it to be used in a great many ways from which it had been previously barred, and this increase in consumption in turn reacted on the manufactures, and the extension of plants and the employment of more workmen was the result.

TRIUMPH OF AMERICAN SHIPBUILDERS.

John Roach, of Chester, Pa., was the successful bidder for the first vessels of the new Navy, and his figures were $774,100 below the estimate of the Advisory Board. But he was not permitted to complete the vessels, as his failure compelled the United States to take over the cruisers and finish the work. The result was that it was 1886 before the Atlanta was commissioned and not until 1887 that the Chicago and Boston were placed in active service. The speeds attained by these cruisers ranged from 16.35 knots for the Chicago to 16 for the Atlanta, and this at a time when there were only eight 16-knot vessels in the world. This fact speaks well for the builders of that time, especially when it is taken into consideration that there was disagreement in the Advisory Board over nearly every phase of the question—engines, screws, sail power, etc. But notwithstanding this the result was highly satisfactory, and the vessels so constructed are to-day among the most efficient of their class in the Navy. One of them, the Boston, was with Dewey at Manila, and the Dolphin took part in the Cuban blockade. The Atlanta and Chicago were undergoing repairs at the time of the Cuban war, and so did not have their baptism of fire.

Additional ships were not authorized until the session of 1884–85, when the Newark and Charleston, cruisers, and the gunboats Yorktown and Petrel were provided for. The Charleston was constructed from plans purchased in England, and her engines combined features of the machinery of several foreign countries. But this vessel, built on these lines, was criticized as being behind the times, for her engines were compound, where the naval practice of the period was to use triple expansion. But for all that she did good service. Her first work was on the Pacific coast, where she captured the steamer Itata, suspected of filibustering in connection with the Chilean revolution of 1891, after a chase of more than 6,000 miles, steaming to Iquique, Chile, under war conditions. During the Spanish war she was sent to Manila, and on her way across the Pacific she called at Guam and took possession of that island in the name of the United States, the Spanish garrison making no opposition. In 1900, while cruising off the northern coast of Luzon, she ran on an uncharted reef and sank. When the Yorktown was completed, she, with the Chicago, Atlanta, Boston, and Dolphin, were sent to Europe to show our friends on the other side that we could really do that which they claimed we were incapable of doing, namely, build modern ships of war and sail them. That memorable cruise, the first of the new Navy, dispelled some of the doubts that had existed in European minds as to our mechanical and nautical skill; but there was still question whether we could really fight such vessels in case of need. The contempt of the Spanish toward us was only the exaggerated sentiment of the rest of Europe. But the events of the Spanish war very effectively removed the impression that we could not maneuver a fleet in action and shoot rapidly and straight. The practical annihilation of the navy of Spain was the answer the new Navy of the United States gave to the unfriendly critics of the Old World.

THE FIRST BATTLE SHIPS.

The Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth Congresses had authorized only eight vessels, aggregating 22,591 tons, and costing $5,407,500 for hulls and machinery. It was but a fair beginning, for the little fleet had but little offensive power, and would have been of scant protection in case of war. But the Forty-ninth Congress began the work of constructing the fighting machines on which the burden of conflict must fall in time of trouble, and authorized two second-class battle ships, the Texas and Maine, and the protected cruisers Baltimore, Philadelphia, and San Francisco. A torpedo boat, the Cushing, was also authorized, besides six monitors, two gunboats, and the dynamite cruiser Vesuvius. The aggregate tonnage of these vessels was 56,491 tons and the cost over $12,000,000.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from California allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. Has the Senator from California figured what percentage of the cost of a battle ship is represented by labor?

Mr. PERKINS. It is nearly all labor. The royalty on the iron ore that is taken from the ground is about 50 cents a ton. It is converted into pig iron, and the pig iron into steel, and the steel into steel plates, and they are then fashioned and shaped into form. It is nearly all labor.

Mr. SCOTT. It would be over 90 per cent?

Mr. PERKINS. At least 95 per cent of it is labor. Indeed, it is all labor, one might say, from the time the miner with his pick delves in the ground to extract the iron, and the miner digs coal in the coal fields of West Virginia to smelt the iron, by which it is converted into pig iron, and the pig iron into ingots of steel.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator will allow me. The building of a navy, then, really is a benefit to the working classes of the country. The money all comes back and stays in this country.

Mr. PERKINS. My friend, the Senator from West Virginia, has anticipated what I was about to state.

Mr. SCOTT. Excuse me.

Mr. PERKINS. It is really a benefit to the laboring men of this country. In my story here, which is somewhat tedious, perhaps, I have endeavored to show, so far as it was practical for me to do so, the evolution of our Navy, and not only the evolution of the old Navy, which I have glanced over very rapidly, but also of our new Navy up to the present time. I will show that to-day we are the second power in the world, ship for ship, ton for ton, gun for gun—second only to England.

A NAVY JUST IN TIME.

Congress had, therefore, entered fully upon the course of creating a modern navy, and, as events proved, it was high time, for if we had not then got fairly at work, it is probable that the Spanish war would have found us unable to cope with such a weak naval power as Spain. The Maine and the Texas were the largest seagoing war ships we had at that time undertaken to construct, the former being 6,682 tons and the latter 6,315 tons, each of a little over 17 knots speed, and costing $2,500,000 each for hull and machinery. The cruisers were of about 4,000 tons, with speeds of about 20 knots. The battle ships were the first armored cruising ships ever built in the United States, and the necessity for this type was realized when it was seen with what ease the French ships, in the Min River, China, caused the Chinese fleet to surrender in 1884. Then was demonstrated the terribly destructive effect of modern guns and the absolute necessity of armor to protect fighting vessels. The Maine, it will be remembered, was blown up in the harbor of Habana, and was the immediate cause of the Spanish war. The Baltimore was with Dewey during the historic episode in Manila Bay.

The nation, having fairly launched itself in the great undertaking of creating a modern navy, went steadily ahead. But the progress, though sure, was not rapid, for it was not until 1892 that Congress authorized the Iowa, the last of the five battle ships that were ready to take part in the Spanish war, and without which we should at that time have been in far from a good condition to wage war in Cuba. Since that date every Congress has authorized one or more first-class battle ships. The Iowa, the most modern of our fighting ships at the time of the Spanish war, was of 11,340 tons and 17 knots speed, costing $5,871,206. From that time the size of battle ships increased a few hundred tons each year until 16,000-ton ships were attained. A few years ago it was believed that this displacement would very rarely be exceeded, but suddenly the world began to build fighting machines still more huge, and the Congress just ended has authorized the construction of two monster battle ships of 20,000 tons each.

PRESENT STRENGTH OF OUR NAVY.

On the first of last July the Navy of the United States consisted of 325 vessels, of which 20 were under construction, 8 authorized and 12 unfit for service. There were ready for sea 285 vessels, including all classes. But the sea strength—the fighting strength—of the Navy excludes vessels over twenty years old unless they have been reconstructed or rearmed since 1900, transports, colliers, repair ships, converted merchant vessels and other auxiliaries, and all vessels less than 1,000 tons, except torpedo craft, and of these boats of less than 50 tons are excluded. There is thus left an immediately efficient sea going fleet of purely fighting craft numbering 144, as follows: Battle ships, 22; armored cruisers, 10; cruisers, 41; destroyers, 16; torpedo boats, 32; submarines, 12; coast-defense vessels, 11. But two battle ships, the Mississippi and Idaho, are so nearly completed that they will very soon be added to the fighting strength of the fleet. The effective vessels are manned by 2,081 officers, 34,062 enlisted men, and 8,414 officers and enlisted men of the Marine Corps. The battle ships range in size from 10,288 tons displacement to 16,000 tons, and the armored cruisers from 8,150 to 14,500 tons, only two being below 13,680 tons. The total tonnage of battle ships is 292,146; of armored cruisers, 128,445 tons; of cruisers, 131,487 tons; of coast-defense vessels, 45,334 tons. The tonnage of torpedo boats, destroyers, and submarines is 14,204. The total displacement of our effective vessels is therefore 611,616 tons.

Mr. NELSON. If it would not embarrass the Senator from California, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. PERKINS. Not at all.

Mr. NELSON. How much water do these various ships draw, and can they enter most of our principal harbors?

Mr. PERKINS. That is quite an important question, and the answer to it is all important, too. Our battle ships draw from 26 to 28 feet of water. Anticipating the inquiry of my friend, the Senator from Minnesota, knowing how vigilant he is in whatever he undertakes—for I have been associated with him on the Committee on Commerce for many years—and thinking he might ask me some such question, I made inquiry of the Coast and Geodetic Survey as to the depth of water in the different principal ports of the United States.

It is said by some of our friends who are not in favor of subsidizing American shipping that we are appropriating fifty to seventy-five million dollars annually for the purpose of dredging our harbors and improving them to accommodate foreign ships, but it will be apparent that the work is necessary to enable our own ships of war to enter our own harbors.

In response to the inquiry of the Senator from Minnesota, I will, with his permission, give the list as given to me by the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

This is a statement of low water at various ports in the United States. First, on the east coast, Portland, Me., 30 feet; Boston, 27; New York, 35; Philadelphia, 23; Baltimore, 30; Norfolk, 28; Savannah, 22; Charleston, 26. Therefore there would be only three of those ports into which it would be safe for a battle ship to go at low tide. There ought to be 2 feet of water between the keel of a ship and the bottom.

Gulf ports: Key West, 26 feet; Mobile, 23 feet; New Orleans, 28 feet; Galveston, 27 feet. New Orleans may have it now, but I remember when I was on a ship as a boy we had to remain at the bar six weeks, and the ship drew only 16 feet of water. We had to wait for the freshets.

On the Pacific coast we have not so many ports, but many of them have ample depth of water. San Diego, 27½ feet; San Francisco, 33 feet; Portland, Oreg., about 19 or 20 feet; Seattle and those ports will supply any depth of water.

DEPTH OF OUR PRINCIPAL HARBORS.

Here is a list of vessels that have entered various ports drawing a certain draft of water. I will not weary the Senate by reading it, but I think, perhaps, it might be well to place it in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Information furnished Senator PERKINS, February 18, 1908.]

Low water at various United States ports.

	Feet.
East coast:
Portland, Me	30
Boston	27
New York	35
Philadelphia	23
Baltimore	30
Norfolk	28
Savannah	22
Charleston, S. C	26
Gulf coast:
Key West	26
Mobile	23
New Orleans	28
Galveston	27
Pacific coast:
San Diego	27½
San Francisco	33
Portland, Oreg., about 19 or 20 feet.
Seattle, deep enough for any draft.

Vessels have actually entered various harbors within a year drawing:

	Ft.	In.
Portland, Me	28
Boston	31	4
New York	34	8
Philadelphia	29	2
Baltimore	30
Norfolk	30
Charleston	25
Savannah	23
Key West	25
New Orleans	28
Galveston	28

Mr. PERKINS. I think the inquiry of my friend from Minnesota is very pertinent and to the point. In building ships of great draft, if lack of water would prevent them from entering the harbors, certainly there would not be any benefit. That is a question we shall have to consider in connection with the appropriations for building immense battle ships. I think the two large vessels of the Cunard Line recently constructed—the Lusitania and Mauretania—have a draft of water which makes it impossible for them to enter New York Harbor at low tide.

THE COMPARATIVE FIGHTING STRENGTH.

Such are the salient facts in relation to our sea force, but what of its comparative fighting strength? I think that the Scientific American explains the difficulties of the problem very clearly when it says:

It is a difficult matter to find a basis of comparison of the strength of the world's navies which will give satisfactory results. There are so many elements that affect naval efficiency, and the military value of these elements differ so widely that it is simply impossible to make a comparison based upon any one of them which will give a reliable result. A mere statement of the total number of ships in each navy will not suffice, since these ships vary in size, speed, armor, and armament. It has been claimed that a comparison based on the total number and weight of guns carried would suffice; but the value of a gun depends greatly upon the character of the ship which carries it, the kind of mount upon which it is placed, the degree of armor protection, etc. Because of these modifying conditions, a 12-inch gun in one ship may expect to have two or three times the battle life and efficiency of a 12-inch gun in some other ship. Nor will a comparison on the basis of armor protection suffice, for a fleet which is powerful only in its defensive qualities and in which the area and thickness of its armor plating has been increased at the expense of the armament and the speed, would be wanting in that mobility and power to swiftly concentrate and deliver a telling blow at the critical moment, upon which the success of a naval campaign so greatly depends. So, also, a comparison on a basis of speed would be misleading, for high speed is one of the most costly elements in a war ship, costly in the large demands which it makes upon displacement, and it is a fact that, unless the size of the units be very large, unusually high speed in war ships is always associated with limited gun power and inadequate protection. A fleet of exceedingly fast, but moderately armed and moderately protected ships, might sweep the seas of the smaller unprotected cruisers and the general sea-borne commerce of an enemy, but it would be powerless to force the issue by a decisive line-of-battle engagement. Then, lastly, and perhaps most important of all, there is the question of age. We do not recall any product of human industry which, as the years go by, depreciates so rapidly in value as the war ship; and the most elaborate estimate of the relative value of the fleets of the world is not worth the paper it is written on unless the question of the age of the ships be most carefully considered. War ships built to-day have at least twice the value of those built ten years ago, and from four to six times the value of those built twenty years ago. Great Britain awoke to this fact and acted upon it in the most trenchant way when she swept over 100 war ships off the list and placed them under the auctioneer's hammer.

I will say, having been engaged in the maritime business many years, that it is the rule of every prudent company to write off every year 5 per cent of the value of a vessel. The result is that the life of a vessel is but twenty years. Yet it requires a great deal of money to keep the vessels in order, as I shall show later on from figures taken from the records of the Bureau of Construction of the amount it would cost to keep a ship in ordinary repair, and they deteriorate, I will say, quite as much when laid up as when in service.

THE UNITED STATES SECOND IN NAVAL STRENGTH.

It is the opinion of the writer of the above and of many experienced naval men that the only true basis of comparison is total displacement modified by consideration of age. If this basis is adopted and comparison is made with the naval strength of the other principal nations of the world, the United States is found to be second only to Great Britain. The relative order of tonnage of effective fighting vessels stands as follows:

	Tonnage.
Great Britain	1,633,116
United States	611,616
France	609,079
Germany	529,032
Japan	374,701
Russia	232,943
Austria	113,235

According to the Bureau of Navigation, the tonnage of all naval vessels built or building November 1, 1907, shows France in the second place, with 836,112 tons, against 771,758 for the United States, and if we authorize two battle ships of the Dreadnought type the figures for the United States will be increased to about 812,000 tons, leaving France still second in tonnage on the sea. But these figures are, in a way, deceptive, for they include coast-defense vessels, which are not designed for cruising, and consequently should not figure in our computation of strength on the high seas. If we eliminate these we shall have 766,666 tons for the United States and 762,812 for France, leaving us still second by a small margin. But if we compute the strength of line-of-battle ships—the true fighting strength of the Navy—including battle ships and armored cruisers, we shall find a still greater margin in our favor.

As intimated in the resolution which I have offered and which we have under consideration, I think we ought to maintain our relative position as the second great naval power of the world. I will show you later, if I have not already done so, that for effective service we are to-day the second great naval power. It is a most popular branch of our Government to-day with the people, but they seem to underrate or underestimate the great progress we have made during the past ten years in building up our Navy.

According to the Navy Yearbook, compiled by Mr. Pitman Pulsifer, we have built, building, and provided for 563,591 tons in ships of this character. But foreign naval authorities class the Charleston, Milwaukee, and St. Louis—nominally protected cruisers—as armored cruisers, and if we add their tonnage—29,100 tons—and the 40,000 tons in two new battle ships of the Dreadnought type, we shall have 632,691 tons of purely fighting ships against 590,215 for France, giving us a lead of over 42,000 tons, while our vessels are not so old, and are thereby relatively more effective than the French. Two more big-gun battle ships, therefore, will assure us the second place as a sea power. We shall have thirty-one battle ships against twenty-seven for France, with twelve armored cruisers—or fifteen if we adopt the foreign classification of the three cruisers named above—against twenty-three French of the same class. But our armored cruisers will average 12,400 tons against 9,600 for the French, so that, on the basis of the greater number of guns in a shorter line, our cruisers should be at least equal in offensive strength to the greater number in the French navy.

CONSTRUCTION BY OTHER NATIONS.

In November Great Britain had under construction four battle ships and six armored cruisers; France, eight battle ships and four armored cruisers; the United States, seven battle ships and two armored cruisers; Germany, six battle ships and two armored cruisers; Japan, two battle ships and two armored cruisers. With the authorization of two more big-gun ships we should be far in advance of all other naval powers in the matter of new construction of battle ships, surpassing even Great Britain. And in the past ten years we have been next to Great Britain in the matter of appropriations for new construction and in the tonnage constructed. I refer to this more particularly because many claim that we ought to provide for four large battle ships. It is understood that provision will be made for two, which will give us, as I have endeavored to show, relatively, a position second only to that of Great Britain, and far in excess of that of France.

According to Lord Brassey, during the ten years from 1896 to 1906, the United States expended in new construction £48,938,200, while France did not expend so much by £520,000. And in that time we added 503,100 tons to the aggregate of the displacement of our naval vessels, while France added only 388,600 tons. No country except Great Britain equaled the United States in the total expenditure on the Navy, which was for the United States in the ten-year period £152,403,000, against £120,610,000 for France, and only £81,974 for Germany.

Yet, before projected ships are on the water, other and more formidable ships will be authorized or begun, and we may, I think, be assured that the additions to our Navy will be such as to keep us for all time in the second place as a sea power. Germany and Japan we have already so far outstripped that there is no likelihood that they will ever overtake us. But in the number of men we fall behind. Our effective fleet has 34,062 enlisted men, against 41,070 of Japan, 42,400 of Germany, 51,926 of France, and 98,973 of Great Britain. But, as is well known, the fighting strength of a body of men does not reside entirely in numbers. The character of the man behind the gun, as Rear-Admiral Mahan pointed out years ago, is a prime factor, which often makes a hundred men the superior in fighting power to a thousand.

So, I believe, the recent target practice in the Navy has given every evidence of the great energy, efficiency, and power of our ships and of the skill of our men behind the guns. We need have no uneasiness, therefore, on account of the lesser number of men per ton on our fighting ships.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Have we men sufficient to man the different war and other vessels that we have so as to make them the most efficient possible?

Mr. PERKINS. I understand that now we can fill up the quota. We have not done so heretofore. I will say, by way of explanation to my friend from Illinois, that the sailor experience is not so much required now as in former days. The modern battle ship is a great machine shop, and men who have not been following the sea who are good machinists are very efficient in many ways on a battle ship. Under the old Navy, the Navy of 1812 that I referred to, it was the men of experience on sailing ships who were necessary to man our vessels of war. A man had to graduate in the fishing trade or the coast trade, but I am informed by the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance that now they can fill at almost any time the demand for men for our fighting ships.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will state to the Senator that what caused me to ask the question is the great disparity in numbers as compared with Japan when you take into consideration the fact that our tonnage is so much greater than that of Japan.

Mr. PERKINS. The ships of war of Japan carry about 30 per cent more men than we do. Therefore it can be said that an American sailor is worth nearly two of Japan's.

Mr. HOPKINS. Why is that? Why do the Japanese ships carry so many more sailors?

Mr. PERKINS. It is a matter of expense. The sailor's wages on a Japanese ship is $5 a month, while we pay our men $16, and they do not care to go to sea for that. We have, however, first-class men now in our Navy.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from California will kindly suspend while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2982) to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection it is so ordered. The Senator from California will proceed.

AN ENGLISHMAN'S IDEA.

Mr. PERKINS. In further answer to the Senator from Illinois, I will quote what Lord Brassey says. It is the opinion of the British Engineering Magazine that we should supply more men. It says:

> Of personnel it may be said in passing that the United States Navy is short some thousands of men; and although the officers responsible say that this deficit could easily be filled, it can not be considered that the Navy is an efficient service until this is done; and, in spite of official optimism, the supply of freeborn white Americans who seek a living on the sea is by no means on the increase.

This is British authority, and just here is a strong argument in favor of the rehabilitation of the American merchant marine, which can give us a reserve supply of seafaring men, as it did in times past, and such as England possesses to-day. My friend from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who to-day I am relieving, says he will take the floor on Monday and show the necessity of rehabilitating the American merchant marine, in order to supply sailors.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PERKINS. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was called from the Senate Chamber and I have not had the great pleasure I anticipated of listening to the Senator from California during his entire address to-day. I note that he has been discussing the American sailor—the matter of crews on our ships. I have been told that two-thirds of the men who have gone on the Pacific cruise on our battle ships have been recently recruited from the agricultural regions of the West and the Northwest. They make most excellent men, of course, but I anticipate that they have gone as on a pleasure trip, rather than with a view of remaining in the service. Is there not great danger that after the term of their enlistment expires they will leave the service and we shall then have a very great shortage of men for service on our ships?

Mr. PERKINS. I think, Mr. President, with the Senator from New Hampshire, that we ought to rehabilitate our merchant marine, so that we can have experienced sailors to draw from in case of emergency to fill places that do not require the training necessary in those who manage machinery, tend boilers, and have to do with the complicated machinery of a modern ship of war.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator for expressing that view. Beyond doubt there is very great necessity for doing that.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, Mr. President, that is quite true. We have naval training stations, and those men furnish the recruits for our Navy. The 14,000 sailors now en route to the Pacific enlisted for a term of years, and they were prompted and inspired to enlistment by patriotism. Our Navy has become very popular among the sailor men, although the wages we pay are not those paid in the merchant service.

ADVANCE IN NAVAL CONSTRUCTION.

The battle of the Sea of Japan, in which Japan wiped out the remnants of the naval power of Russia, taught lessons which have led to marked changes in the character of fighting ships. A study of that battle has convinced naval experts that in an engagement that fleet will be victorious which can place on the shortest battle line the greatest number of 12-inch or other larger guns. Therefore there has come upon the scene the huge 20,000-ton battle ship, armed with the most powerful 12-inch or 13-inch rifled guns, on whose smashing effect the results of battle rest. The big ship is designed for the purpose of shortening the battle line, thus concentrating the big-gun fire. The United States has authorized the construction of two of these 20,000-ton monster fighting machines, and the President recommends that the present Congress authorize four more. The terribly destructive effect of the modern 12 and 13 inch guns at close range is so great that the distance at which sea battles are fought has been greatly increased. It is estimated that in the battle of the Sea of Japan the distance between the hostile fleets was 5,000 yards, or about 3 miles, and it is believed that the newer and higher-power guns of to-day would lead to an increase of the distance to fully 7,000 yards, or 4 miles. Accuracy of fire is, therefore, a prime necessity, and for that reason the existing naval vessels of the different nations spend much time in target practice. It was the target practice of the Japanese that completely smothered the Russian fleet and destroyed in a few hours the sea power of the Czar. What the United States Navy is doing in this line of work is illustrated by the record of the battle ship Connecticut, flagship of the Pacific fleet, now on its way to San Francisco. Targets 30 feet high and 50 feet long—about an eighth the exposed surface of a modern battle ship—were hit by four 12-inch, nine 8-inch, and seventeen 7-inch shells as the vessels steamed for eight minutes from a position 4½ miles from the target to one 5½ miles distant. That is taken from the official record. It is a most wonderful exhibition of skill on the part of the men behind the gun on the ships. This is clearly a case of shooting straight, which has always characterized the men on board American ships of war.

IMPORTANCE OF THE BIG-GUN SHIP.

In heavy armor-piercing guns England, of course, is pre-eminent, having 292 that can be brought into action when the vessels under construction and authorized are completed. France comes next with 160, and the United States third with 144. Germany and Japan have 118 each. These are the guns which would probably prove decisive in any engagement, and the fleet which could bring the greatest number within the shortest battle line would undoubtedly be the victor. The big ships alone could shorten the line and concentrate the big-gun fire, and the fleet having the greatest number of big ships would, therefore, in all likelihood be the victor, the fighting qualities of the men being equal, even though the opposing fleet had a far greater aggregate displacement.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to ask the Senator another question. If in the modern war vessel the distance between the contending navies will be 3 or 4 miles, of what great benefit are the torpedo boats? I ask the question in view of the fact, as I understand, that the other branch of Congress has authorized a larger number of torpedo boats than was recommended by the Department.

Mr. PERKINS. It is a question of evolution in high explosives.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was about to remark, if the Senator will permit me, that the increase allowed by the other House is not in torpedo boats, but in submarines, and it is not expected that the submarines will go very far from shore to do their fighting. They are largely designed for coast defense.

Mr. HOPKINS. But we have given a large amount of money from time to time for the construction of torpedo boats in our Navy, have we not?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; but my suggestion was that, as far as the increase in the pending naval bill is concerned, it is for submarines proper.

Mr. HOPKINS. I understand that the submarines are used for coast service largely.

Mr. PERKINS. Answering the Senator from Illinois, in my opinion the torpedo is a very effective mode of warfare. It can be sent 3,000 yards from the torpedo destroyer, which goes with great speed—at 30 knots an hour, perhaps. It goes within a short distance of the battle ship and sends its torpedo on its mission of destruction and is particularly effective in a naval engagement against battle ships that have had their offensive power weakened by the fire of big guns. They are said to have been very effective in the hands of the Japanese in the battle of the Sea of Japan against the crippled vessels of the Russians. It is the opinion of Admiral Mahan and other eminent men in our Navy that torpedoes are most effective, both as offensive and defensive weapons.

Mr. GALLINGER. We had an illustration of that at Port Arthur.

Mr. HOPKINS. What is the opinion of the Navy people as to the number of torpedo boats that should be constructed in proportion to the number of cruisers and battle shipe?

NEED OF MORE TORPEDO BOATS.

Mr. PERKINS. Japan has a very much greater proportion than we have. I think myself that we are deficient in torpedo boats. The Naval Board, of which Admiral Dewey is president, the Joint Army and Navy Board, and the General Board have this matter under consideration. Our Committee on Naval Affairs also have it under consideration; and I would hardly like to venture an opinion until we have had their evidence, which will materially aid in forming a conclusion on the various questions before our committee.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then, as I understand it, in constructing a great navy and maintaining it as we are seeking to do, there is a certain proportion of torpedo boats that will be constructed with other war vessels.

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly; that is the policy of the Navy Department. It is the policy of the Bureau of Construction, and also, I think, of both Houses of Congress. It is the part of wisdom, it seems to me, for the United States to profit by the experience of other countries. Great Britain has pursued that course, France has done so, and Japan used torpedoes most effectively in the recent war with Russia.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. PERKINS. With pleasure.

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to ask the Senator from California how many colliers are now in transit with our fleet to the Pacific coast for the purpose of carrying supplies of coal?

Mr. PERKINS. Does the Senator refer to American colliers?

Mr. SCOTT. I am asking for the total number.

Mr. PERKINS. Twenty-one, I think, left the Atlantic coast.

Mr. SCOTT. Of the twenty-one how many are American built or flying the American flag?

Mr. PERKINS. Two, I think; not more than three.

Mr. GALLINGER. Two.

Mr. SCOTT. There are only two of those colliers that belong to America and fly the flag?

Mr. PERKINS. That is one of the bad features.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the Bureau of Navigation recommend the building of additional colliers?

Mr. PERKINS. I understand so; and there are several bills for that purpose now pending before Congress. Two have been introduced in the Senate. One, I think, by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and another by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], providing for the purchase of some colliers that have already been built in American yards.

Mr. SCOTT. How far could the battle-ship fleet possibly proceed, even on a pacific mission, without the aid of colliers to carry supplies of coal?

Mr. PERKINS. Three thousand miles, I think, would be an extreme distance.

Mr. SCOTT. Perhaps two or three days.

Mr. PERKINS. About ten days—that is, under ordinary speed.

Mr. SCOTT. From five to ten days?

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. PERKINS. With pleasure.

Mr. DEPEW. I have inquired about these colliers. I think the exact number is thirty-seven.

Mr. PERKINS. I took the statement in the press at the time that twenty-one left here. A part, I think, only went down on the southern coast. I think only ten went through the Straits of Magellan. However, it is a pretty serious question, and the Senator from West Virginia makes a very pertinent inquiry, "What would we do with the colliers which we have now chartered if we were at war with another nation?" Probably we would have to charter others.

Mr. SCOTT. I will ask another question, if the Senator will pardon me. In case we were engaged in a war, would it not be impossible for us to charter these vessels from a neutral power?

Mr. PERKINS. I think we could purchase them or press them into service.

Mr. SCOTT. We would have to purchase them before we declared war.

Mr. PERKINS. We purchased from England during the Spanish war. We have on the Pacific coast, I think, some six or eight foreign-built vessels now in the transport service between the Pacific coast ports and the Philippine Islands.

Coming down to the practical question, the big-gun ship has come to stay, and we are preparing to build two of 20,000 tons displacement and 21 knots speed, larger than any battle ship yet built by any other nation. The Dreadnought—that big-gun ship which England built with such astonishing rapidity and which has set the pace for other nations—is only 17,900 tons, and none of the six large fighters now on the stocks in England equals in size our North Dakota and Delaware, whose construction has just commenced. Three of the new English battle ships, building or authorized, are of 18,600 tons, and three of the improved Dreadnought class are of 19,250 tons displacement. It has been stated that the last three are to be given 13½-inch guns, but the accepted belief is that they will be armed with ten 12-inch rifles. The smaller ships will carry ten 12-inch guns.

France is constructing six battle ships of 18,350 tons and two of 14,865 tons, but the programme for 1909 contemplates only battle ships of 20,000 or 21,000 tons, 20 knots speed, with turbine engines, and is leaning toward an armament of 16 guns of 274 millimeters, or nearly 11 inches. They suggest even as many as 20 guns of 240 millimeters, or about 9½ inches.

THE LIFE OF A SHIP OF WAR.

As I said, the life of a ship is twenty years, and we write off every year 5 per cent. I think with a battle ship the improvements that have been made in the engines and boilers would make the life of the ship much less.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Does not the Senator think 10 per cent is about the average percentage of loss as applied to a battle ship and its machinery?

Mr. PERKINS. It is, undoubtedly; because the life of an engine and of a boiler is only about ten years. The corrosion and galvanic action upon the boilers will make the average life of a boiler not to exceed ten years.

Mr. WARREN. That would represent the entire percentage of loss on a large battle ship.

Mr. PERKINS. I think so.

Mr. WARREN. That would amount to the same thing as a battle ship being practically consumed in ten years.

Mr. PERKINS. That is the calculation made by my friend from Wyoming.

Japan is constructing a battle ship of 19,200 tons and one of 19,800 tons. The latter has a battery of four 12-inch and twelve 10-inch rifles. Four more ships are planned for this year, of 21,000 tons, 20 knots speed, each carrying twelve 12-inch guns. She has one armored cruiser, the Tsukuba, of nearly 20,000 tons, and plans two more such ships.

Italy seems to have set her limit at 16,000 tons and Austria at 14,500 tons.

RELATION OF SIZE OF SHIPS TO DEPTH OF HARBORS.

Mr. President, there must be a limit to the size of battle ships, which limit is set by the depth of harbors, for a ship must after all rely upon the land for support and must visit dockyards for supplies and repairs. This applies to what has already been anticipated by me in what I have said to my friend from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

It is apparent that that limit is nearly reached, for there are few harbors that will admit vessels of over 35-foot draft. The huge Lusitania, of the Cunard Line, of 38,000 tons displacement and drawing 33½ feet, is undoubtedly as large a vessel as can enter New York Harbor without a further expenditure for dredging. That harbor, Norfolk, San Francisco, and Puget Sound are, I think, the only harbors we have that can receive the largest vessels now afloat. I was surprised at the list given me by the Coast and Geodetic Survey relative to the depth of water at Baltimore.

It is pointed out by naval authorities that Germany is limited in the size of its fighting ships by the shallowness of its harbors. In spite of the energy of the Emperor and his intense desire to create as powerful a fleet as exists, he can not alter the physical configuration of the German coast. Thus at present Germany possesses no battle ships of over 13,200 tons, though four of 19,000 tons are projected. It is quite safe to say that these figures represent about the limit of size for German ships unless there is a great improvement in harbors. But even when the limit of size has been reached the building of war ships must continue, for the reason that a new vessel is hardly in the water before some other nation lays the keel of another which outclasses her in some important respects. Advances in the construction of engines, boilers, speed, armor, armament, guns, ammunition, and torpedoes are constantly made, and when incorporated in a new vessel create a new and more efficient fighting machine. Already foreign naval experts class the Indiana, the Massachusetts, and the glorious Oregon, which was the crack ship of the ocean at the time of the Spanish war, as obsolescent—hardly worthy of being considered as effective in line of battle when pitted against the newer ships of the world's navies. England has virtually wiped out eleven battle ships of from 10,500 to 14,150 tons as obsolescent, though among them we find the Royal Sovereign, the Emperor of India, and the Hood, which a few years ago were considered the most powerful ships of the British navy.

This proves what I said, in answer to a question already propounded to me, that the vessels have become obsolete by the greater improvements being made in structure, machinery, and general fighting capacity.

The new naval programme of Germany includes a proposition to decrease the nominal life of a battle ship from twenty-five to twenty years of active service, which, if adopted, will lead to the construction of five 19,000-ton battle ships instead of four. Thus progress in science is constantly lessening the efficiency of existing fleets by bringing into the field others which outclass them in many or all important points. Therefore the nation that would keep on the sea a fleet equal to all emergencies must be constantly building new ships and planning still others before the keels of those authorized are even laid. For that reason I have an idea that it will be a wise policy for us to limit the number of ships which we build yearly, and that one or two should be the maximum of these huge ships to be built each year.

The two huge battle ships authorized by the Fifty-ninth Congress are evidences of the sudden changes which occur in the ideals of naval construction. These big fighting machines are the results of the observations made during the progress of the war between Japan and Russia, and the study given to the details of the naval battles, particularly that of the Sea of Japan, in which Admiral Togo destroyed the Russian fleet. Up to that time it had been one of the cardinal points of naval construction to provide for what are called "secondary batteries," which consisted of a large number of guns of small caliber compared with the four big guns which composed the main battery of battle ships. The manner in which the Russo-Japanese battles were fought, the nature of the injuries received, and the controlling factors in the work of demolishing the Russian vessels seemed to teach that it was the big guns that were the most efficacious, and that the 8-inch and 6-inch rifles were of practically no avail against amored ships at the distances at which they are fought. The conclusion was that inasmuch as we had learned how to handle big 12-inch guns so as to secure accuracy of fire, a battle ship carrying only 12-inch guns as an offensive force, with simply small-bore rifles to repel torpedo-boat attacks, presented the very highest type of efficiency. So the great European naval powers set about creating such ships, and England built the Dreadnought and commissioned her October 2, 1906. This great ship is 490 feet long, 17,900 tons displacement, of 21½-knot speed, with about 26,000 horsepower, and a bunker capacity of 2,700 tons. Her main battery consists of ten 12-inch breech-loading rifles in turrets. She has no secondary battery; her entire offensive power is centered in the ten great guns in her turrets.

OUR OWN BIG-GUN BATTLE SHIPS.

The United States had about the same time authorized the South Carolina, of 450 feet length, 16,000 horsepower, and 18½ knots, to be armed with eight 12-inch rifles, but when the details of the Dreadnought came to hand it was seen that our own big vessel was outclassed. Hence Congress was urged to authorize the construction of vessels of the Dreadnought class, and this was done by the Congress just ended. The two great battle ships which will now be built will cost, exclusive of armor and armament, $6,000,000 each, and probably $12,000,000 each when ready for commission. They will be 510 feet long, 85 feet 2⅝ inches beam, of 20,000 tons displacement, and 2,300 tons bunker capacity, with a speed of 21 knots. They will have for a main battery ten 12-inch breech-loading rifles, and for a secondary battery fourteen 5-inch rapid-fire guns; four 3-pound saluting guns; four 1-pound semiautomatic guns; two 3-inch fieldpieces, and two machine guns. There will be two submerged torpedo tubes. The hull will be protected by a water-line belt 8 feet wide and 11 inches thick. Above this 10-inch armor will extend in a belt 7 feet 3 inches wide, and above this there will be armor 5 inches thick to protect smokestacks, the secondary battery, etc. The arrangement of the main battery is such as to give a broadside fire 25 per cent greater than that of any battle ship now built, or, so far as known, under construction, and the average elevation of the guns above the water line is believed to be greater than that of any other vessel, thus giving a distinct advantage in long-range firing. By compartment arrangements, armor, protective decks, and other provisions, it is believed that those vessels will have defensive qualities greater than those of any vessel now afloat, or up to this time designed. The proportion of weight of hull and armor is greater than in any other battle ship, and the actual total 3,000 tons greater than in the largest battle ship built so far.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. PERKINS. With pleasure.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator from California if the logic of his argument is not that we are simply trying to keep up with the other maritime nations of the world, and that every time they get out an immense ship we try to match it with one of equal capacity? Why not in the very beginning, or right now, if we are going upon that theory, proceed to estimate for the largest possible war ship that can be constructed which can enter any of our ports, build it at once, and man it with the largest possible guns, instead of changing year after year and going by a gradual scale, simply trying to keep up with some of the other nations? It seems to me the logic of the argument is that ships built this year will be of very little value two years from now, and that we are all the time reaching toward greater ships. Why not, then, in the beginning build, man, and equip the very greatest ships that we can put afloat which can enter our harbors?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, that is a point which has developed itself in the ship which we are now building named after the State of my friend from North Dakota, of 20,000 tons displacement, I think it is. As I have stated, I think we have nearly reached the limit in the size of ships.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand from the Senator that his view is now that we have finally reached the limit as to the size of ships that can be built for war purposes.

Mr. PERKINS. It would hardly be fair, Mr. President, to put it in that shape; but I have been endeavoring to show that from the time of the building of the Constitution we have been progressing until we have reached the construction of one of the largest battle ships. That is an evolution which has been gradually going on in development until we have reached a point which could not have existed even in the vivid imagination of my friend from North Dakota ten years ago.

EVOLUTION IN BATTLE-SHIP CONSTRUCTION.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will pardon me, the evolution that has been going on so far has been simply to keep abreast with other great nations in the construction of immense war ships. We have not tried to exceed them to any extent; we have not considered practically what we can do and what ought to be done; but we have been guided simply by the one proposition, that we must have as great a ship of war as Great Britain has produced, and we go a few thousand tons ahead each time. It does seem to me that we ought to start on some plan which looks far enough ahead so that the ship built to-day will be worth something ten years from to-day. The Senator from California speaks of the practical life of a ship as being about ten years.

Mr. PERKINS. Twenty years.

Mr. McCUMBER. About ten years for a war vessel after taking off 10 per cent each year. The Senator's argument, if it establishes anything, establishes the fact that a war ship built ten years ago is practically of no value to-day, and, logically, from the same argument, one built to-day will be practically of no value ten years from to-day, irrespective of the ability to maintain it and keep it in working order during that time.

Mr. PERKINS. Our Navy Department is composed of as eminent men as there are in this or any other country. They are desirous of having geniuses submit plans to them or any new invention in connection with these matters or for experimental purposes; and if my friend from North Dakota will submit plans embodying his ideas, I shall take great pleasure in presenting them to the Department, and I am sure they will receive proper consideration. The evolution in the construction of a battle ship is like that of the rifle which my friend now shoots. A few years ago he shot a muzzle-loading rifle, using black powder, and now he shoots a Winchester, a Henry, or some other modern make of rifle, using smokeless powder. Such a rifle has been produced by this same process of evolution.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I should like the Senator to state his views as to the kind of Navy he desires relatively to the other navies of the world. Does he desire a Navy relatively of a second or third size?

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to maintain our Navy in the present relative position which it now has, which is second only to that of Great Britain. I think our great country ought to maintain that position.

Mr. WARREN. I quite agree with the Senator. It is not a question as to how large a Navy we may be able to build. I think we have the best men in the world behind the guns; and if we hold our relative position as at present, I think we shall be doing quite well enough.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. PERKINS. With pleasure.

THE MEN ON OUR SHIPS OF WAR.

Mr. McCUMBER. If I may be permitted, I should like to make a suggestion in answer to the suggestion that has been made by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I have heard a great deal of the argument about "the man behind the gun." I concede that we have about as good men behind the guns of the United States as has any nation on the face of the earth; but when our friends tell us that our ships are manned about 75 per cent or 80 per cent by foreigners, and not by American citizens at all, it does not seem to me that the question of the men behind the guns counts for so very much in view of the personnel of the present force upon our great war ships. It seems to me—if I may just take one second of the Senator's time——

Mr. PERKINS. I am in search of light.

Mr. McCUMBER. That the drift of our American populace for labor will be where they can get the best remuneration, and you can get good sailors only as you pay good remuneration to them. You are not going to get the very best of our American citizenship and character to be the men behind the guns unless you pay a remuneration that will justify them in giving their service to the Navy instead of to some branch of industry.

For my part, I can not see any difference in this respect between the man who comes from Norway, as the father of my friend from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] came, and the man that was born in this country. When Ole Olsen lands in New York, he is just exactly the same Ole when he lands there that he was when he left Norway. The mere taking on of American citizenship does not give him an inherent quality any better than he had in his old country. What does he get here? He gets the practice. The "man behind the gun" is the man that has the practice; and the country that has got the wealth to expend in the practice—I do not care whether it is on the other side of the ocean or on this side of the ocean—will get good marksmen in time. Japan and Great Britain probably are doing just exactly as well as we are. After all, it is a question not so much of "the man behind the gun" as it is the dollars that are behind the guns and the dollars that can furnish new guns when the old ones are exhausted.

That is to me really the whole question that arises in connection with "the man behind the gun." It is practice. If we want good men for our Navy, we have got to pay for them; and I believe we can get them without even passing the bill recommended by our friend from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator from California permit me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. PERKINS. With pleasure.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] if there has been any claim made that a man must be an American citizen in order to make a good gunner? I make no such claim, but I do say that men educated in the American Navy by American officers—and when I say "American officers" I mean those who are educated at Annapolis and in our schools—are the best in the world. I agree with the Senator perfectly that it is not a matter of where the men were born. They may be born in any country; but the American Navy as it is officered and manned, to my mind, furnishes the best gunners in the world, and they have the best practice and the best schooling.

Now, as to the pay. So far as the rank and file is concerned, the Navy is getting a very sufficient pay. As stated by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the late recruits are largely men from the Northwestern States—all educated men and good men. The Navy is paid to-day in the rank and file just a fraction of 1 per cent less than double what is paid in the Army for corresponding rank and file.

HOW AMERICAN CITIZENSHIP WORKS.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I can only answer my friend from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] by relating an incident that once came under my observation. I was in a mining camp away back in the gold fields of California. A worthless fellow there, who amounted to nothing and had not the respect of anyone, was finally elected constable. They said, "He is a 'rum' customer for a constable, an officer of the law;" but immediately on his election he caused them to change their opinion. There was a riot and a row on hand, and he went into camp and said: "I am a little fellow and only weigh 120 pounds, but I represent this Government; the whole American people are back of me, and I will arrest every man of you." So it is with the men who join the Navy. They do it for patriotism, for love of the country which they have taken an oath to fight for, and not the dollars and cents that they receive.

My friend from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who went to the front during the war, did not go for the little measly $12 or $14 a month that he got. It was patriotism that inspired him, and so it is with nine-tenths of the men who enlist in the Navy. It is patriotism; it is love of country; it is the position they hold that inspires them to do their duty and not the per diem or the per month wages received.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator right there——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. PERKINS. With pleasure.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think that in time of war we get a great deal better citizen soldiery into the Army than we do in time of peace?

Mr. PERKINS. I think there is no question of that.

Mr. McCUMBER. In time of peace it is not so much a question of patriotism. In time of actual war, of course, it is a question of patriotism, and then we get our very best citizenship, irrespective of the remuneration; but to-day we are unable, as is stated, to get men into the Army. They will not go and serve. Still those men are patriotic, and if we were engaged in war they would go quickly and serve the country; but they do not care in time of peace about serving the country for that measly $13 a month, nor will the average American care about going into the Navy in time of peace unless it is sufficiently remunerative. In time of war I think we would have no trouble in manning all our vessels.

THE NEWER SHIPS OF THE NEW NAVY.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President. I was about to say, when interrupted, that the ships to which I have referred should, in truth, be formidable antagonists in a naval battle, and they will cast into the shade the modest little ships with which Dewey achieved his immortal victory, or those with which Sampson and Schley destroyed the Spanish cruisers on the Cuban coast. The advantages claimed for the big-gun ships are concentration of fire, which is easy with a few ships, but difficult where the same number of big guns are dispersed among many vessels. Besides this, it costs less to build and less to maintain a vessel of the Dreadnought type than two ships which will give as great offensive power. The big-gun ships, therefore, permit a very material gain in two ways, and these ways are such that they must be considered. Hence we have come to the all-big-gun battle-ship period, and the United States has set the pace for this style of naval architecture. We may truly feel a just pride in our Navy as it now stands, and when the two big battle ships are afloat we need have no fear on the sea of any other nation on the globe. There is no longer any danger that we shall fall behind in the march of naval progress. Congress has given evidence that it realizes the necessity for being "up to date" in our Navy, and we may be assured that we shall in the future keep at least abreast of the other nations of the world.

But if we are to do so we must avail ourselves of the knowledge of experts, wherever they may be found, who have devoted themselves to naval architecture. To confine ourselves to the experience of a given class of builders will deprive us of the benefits of the discoveries of those who have followed other lines of investigation, or when we are compelled to make use of them we shall find ourselves behind in the race. The most complicated machine yet constructed—the modern battle ship—should embody the results of the most advanced thought at the time it is designed. Constructors of the huge merchant vessels of to-day have ideas of value; private constructors of war ships have experience that is worth considering; the results of experiments of foreign nations must be taken into account. In fact, the whole field of naval architecture must be searched and every well-developed fact to date must be utilized in building a battle ship of to-day, if we are not to have the mortification of seeing our ships outclassed as soon as they are launched.

THE COST OF THE NAVY.

From March 3, 1883, to June 30, 1907, the cost of the vessels of the new Navy, built, building, and authorized, aggregated $309,359,190. The actual cost of the completed battle ships, armored cruisers, protected and unprotected cruisers, aggregated $227,403,833, and there has been expended on vessels under construction $30,454,190. But this is only a part of the cost of the Navy to the nation. During the period above named, the entire pay of the officers and men manning the vessels in commission has been $258,458,611, and the Marine Corps, which is a part of the naval establishment, has cost $28,440,241. There must also be added the repairs to the vessels which will average from $30,000 to $50,000 per year for each of the fighting vessels. Then, there are other expenses at the navy-yards, etc., which add still more to the total of expenditures. The total expenditure on account of the new Navy is, indeed, very large, amounting since 1883 to $1,244,651,029, and most of it is of the character which political economists class as unproductive, and therefore call an absolute waste. But in the case of our new Navy, is it a fact that we have wasted the hundreds of millions of dollars we have put into these ships and have paid to the men who man them? I think that the victory of Dewey and the affair of the Spanish cruisers off the Cuban coast, with the subsequent change of the world's opinion regarding the United States, give a conclusive answer. And, as our Navy grows, the attitude which other nations will take toward us will be further proof that the expenditure has been judiciously made. But in the mere matter of dollars and cents has our new Navy been a mistake? I think not, for these reasons:

HAS OUR NAVY BEEN A MISTAKE?

Up to the time the first steel cruisers were proposed no steel ship plates had been manufactured in this country, and when John Roach put in his bid for them and secured the contract he had to undertake the manufacture of this material, and succeeded in doing so through the steel works of Thurlow, Pa. After receiving the contract, he contracted with the Phœnix Iron Company and Park Brothers, of Pennsylvania, and the Norway Iron and Steel Works, of Boston, for similar material, and this introduced a new industry into this country. And this industry has grown, as everyone knows, but how much is not perhaps fully realized. In 1880, just before we began to build ships which called for steel of domestic manufacture, there were, according to the census of that year, 140,978 wage-earners in the iron and steel trades, earning $55,476,000 in wages, and turning out products worth $296,557,000. The demand for steel of the highest quality resulted, as stated before, in the introduction of processes for its manufacture, for there was a sure market for the product. This enabled manufacturers to improve plants and produce steel at lower and lower cost. Its lower cost enabled it to be used in structural work, where its high price previously prohibited it, and gave birth to the new style of construction which has revolutionized the methods of the building trades, and has given us better structures than we ever had before. The increased plants of the steel manufacturers soon turned out the cheapest rails and railroad iron in the world, and rendered possible that marvelous growth of our railroad system which in time has led to the development of what were the waste places of the continent. And, as we all know, not only do we supply the domestic market with all the iron and steel it demands, but our manufactures go to all parts of the globe. We build bridges in Africa, Burmah, China, and wherever work of that kind is needed, and our rails bear the commerce of the world. The result is that in 1905 there were 857,298 wage-earners in the iron and steel industry, earning yearly $482,357,503 in wages, and producing iron and steel worth $2,176,739,726, according to the Census Bureau. And the average yearly wage per man has increased from about $400, in 1880, to $560, in 1905, or 40 per cent. The wages of the iron and steel workers for one year will more than pay the total cost, when ready for sea, of all the vessels of the new Navy built, under construction, or authorized from 1883 up to the present time, and one-half of the value of the iron products for a single year will pay the cost of the entire naval establishment for the last quarter of a century. That the encouragement given to this industry by the construction of the new Navy has had a very potent influence in bringing about this surprising result can not be doubted. The money expended on our war vessels, therefore, has been anything but an economic loss, judged by a single trade alone.

But there is not an industry in the land, in all probability, which has not felt the stimulus afforded by the construction of our new war ships. The coal industry is very greatly benefited as may well be imagined when it is remembered that every one of our naval vessels burns coal. The brass industry, the copper industry, the electrical industry, and aluminum industry, the food canners and meat packers, the clothing manufacturers, and all the industries which contribute to these different departments of employment of labor, all benefit from the steady demand of the United States for their products. The farmer feels it in the case of the products of his fields. Even the cornstalks, which were formerly waste matter, are now sold to manufacture backing for the armor of battle ships. And whereas there were only eight firms that could bid for the first naval vessels constructed, there are now thirteen great plants fully capable of turning out the largest and most complicated ship of war that can be designed, employing tens of thousands of skilled laborers, who find constant employment in shaping the most wonderful of human productions. The great shipyards of San Francisco, Seattle, Newport News, Philadelphia, New York, Bath, Me., and Quincy, Mass., owe their development to the Government work given them. And our navy-yards have been developed with our Navy, so that now they are in a state of high efficiency, and some of them, like the yards at New York and Mare Island, have been supplied with machinery and all facilities for naval construction. And these yards, which in 1883 employed less than 5,000 men, now furnish work at good wages to nearly 20,000, and all are under civil service, which has supplanted the spoils system, which formerly made our navy-yards simple retreats for political camp followers.

THE NAVY AN EDUCATIONAL STIMULUS.

Educationally, too, the new Navy has been a stimulus in the line of technical, designing, engineering, and mechanical training, and has been no small factor in the success of our technical schools, which are increasing in number and efficiency. We are thus turning out young men of highest technical skill and training, who in turn will use their energy in industrial fields and add still more to the national prosperity. The high standard set by the United States for the material and supplies which go to build and maintain the new Navy have caused manufacturers to design machines to produce the highest class of work at the least expense, and the result is that not only are we now making such machines for European nations, but our product is so superior and so cheap that we find a market wherever steel products are in demand. And the standard set for food, clothing, and other supplies sets a higher standard for all domestic articles of the same class than would otherwise have been demanded. These high standards fixed by the United States on account of its Navy have promoted and improved our national products at large. As ex-Secretary of the Navy Long truly says:

> They all necessitate and encourage the industrial training of our people, and are in line with that education which is now recognized as the most important education—the education of the hand and brain in the useful arts of life.

Since such are some of the benefits to the people at large from the construction of vessels of war, it can hardly be successfully maintained that this expenditure, large as it may be, is a waste of money, particularly for a nation, one year's wages of whose iron and steel workers are sufficient to build a modern navy which has raised the United States from insignificant rank as a sea power to one which is second only to Great Britain. The wages of a second year of our workers in steel and iron would give us a navy equal to that of the mistress of the seas.

WAR SHOWS THE CHARACTER OF THE PERSONNEL.

The new Navy had no chance to show of what material it was made until the Spanish war. Even if there had been an opportunity for action, up to that time we had not fighting vessels enough to make a decent showing on the sea in case of trouble. But just before the breaking out of hostilities we had completed and got ready for commission a little fleet of five battle ships, two armored cruisers, a few protected cruisers and other vessels for lighter duties than fighting, so that when we were called upon to fight we had some good instruments used in the trade of war. The first act in the tragedy was the blowing up of the Maine in the harbor of Habana, and it was in this disaster that the spirit of the Navy, exemplified in the conduct of Captain Sigsbee and his men, showed the temper of the sailors who trod the decks of American men-of-war. Coolness, self-restraint, and bravery of the highest quality were manifest. Then came the brilliant feat of arms of Commodore Dewey in Manila, where were exhibited the sound judgment, dash, enterprise, contempt of danger, and invincible determination which has characterized the American Navy at all periods in its history. And not alone in action were these qualities exhibited in Manila Bay. A supreme test was made after destruction of the Spanish fleet, when Dewey held the city in his grasp for long weeks until the arrival of the Army, in the face of what was the almost hostile demonstrations of the German fleet, that clearly attempted to browbeat the American and wrest from him the fruit of his victory. No greater work during the war was done than was performed by Dewey while his ships were at anchor holding possession of Manila Bay and the hostile city, which he was unable to occupy by reason of his lack of men to land against the Spanish army. That he was able to gain this great though bloodless victory was due not only to his own indomitable courage, resource, and firmness, but to the fact, which the foreign navies soon recognized, that every man on the vessels under the American flag were actuated by the same fighting spirit as was their commander.

On the Cuban coast during the war there were numerous instances showing that the Navy had no exceptions in points of courage, daring, and self-sacrifice. The long blockade of Cervera's fleet displayed the qualities of steadfastness and determination, as the battle in which it was destroyed showed examples of bravery. The exploit of Commander Wainright in sinking the two Spanish torpedo boats with a converted yacht was the most striking incident of that affair, but was recognized as showing the spirit and temper of the whole fleet. The sinking of the Merrimac by Hobson and his gallant crew of volunteers in the harbor's entrance was another instance of daring which many other events of the war showed to be characteristic of the Navy. The unprecedented voyage of the Oregon from San Francisco to Key West, by way of the Straits of Magellan, steaming 14,000 miles in sixty-eight days, was another vivid flash of light on the character of the officers and men who sailed under the American flag.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from California permit me?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

THE MEN OF THE NAVY UNDER FIRE.

Mr. SCOTT. In reference to the Oregon, I should like to ask what was the condition of that vessel after her run of the number of thousands of miles stated, and what was the reply of her captain when he was asked if she was ready for battle?

Mr. PERKINS. In two hours' time he was ready to enter the engagement, and did gallant service there.

The war with Spain brought out the other side of humanity. I have in mind, passing before me like a panorama which has filled us all with patriotism and sympathy, Commodore Jack Phillips's observation when his crew were firing upon the other ships. He said: "Don't shoot, boys; don't you see that the poor fellows are dying!" The enemy's ship was ashore. It shows that after victory came to him his heart went out in sympathy to those whom he had sent ashore in distress.

And after the destruction of the Spanish cruisers the work of rescue of the survivors brought into play the courage and daring of the American sailors in as emphatic a manner as was afforded by battle. To the Navy, too, belongs the honor of having made the first permanent landing in Cuba, for a battalion of marines under Lieutenant-Colonel Huntington occupied Guantanamo in face of the enemy and retained possession after several days of sharp fighting, and thus secured a safe station for coaling and repairing the fleet. The entire series of operations of the fleets during the Spanish war afforded numberless proofs that the new Navy had maintained the glorious standard of the old, and that the American flag covered no braver or more competent seamen in the world.

The history of operations in Samoa and in China during the Boxer outbreak only strengthens the high opinion which our Navy has deservedly secured among the nations of the globe. In Samoa our marines and blue jackets fought side by side with English sailors and earned their hearty praise. At Tientsin, Capt. (now Admiral) B. H. McCalla, with American marines and blue jackets was the first foreign force to land to aid the foreign settlement, and he and his little detachment were the first to enter Peking. In the subsequent expedition of the foreign troops to the Chinese capital, it was the American sailors and marines who cleared the road when the force was compelled to retreat, showing an appetite and aptitude for fighting that elicited praise from every foreign observer. And in the defense of the legations in Peking, it was to the little band of American marines that was intrusted the defense of the wall, and well and heroically did they do their duty. No harder fighting was done during the siege than was done by the men from the American ships of war, and no armed force from any foreign nation exhibited greater courage, steadfastness, bravery, and devotion than did the American marines and blue jackets during those trying days.

You will remember it was only during the last session of Congress, I think, that Germany presented to Admiral McCalla a sword and other trophies in appreciation of his heroic deeds in defense of the German legation at Peking during that siege.

Our new Navy has been tried and has not been found wanting. It is the same Navy which answered the call of John Paul Jones, of Decatur, of Preble, of Porter, and of Farragut, and has proved itself capable of as daring deeds of valor and of as great heroism as have been manifested by the old Navy in times of stress. The old Navy was the strong arm which inspired fear and respect in foreign antagonists. The new Navy will worthily perpetuate the reputation of the old, and while the American flag floats over a keel our country will know that its interests will be protected and its dignity maintained.

THE AMERICAN FLEET IN THE PACIFIC.

As the fleet of Admiral Evans steams up the west coast of the Americas the men behind the guns will be constantly reminded of notable deeds of daring, courage, and enterprise. Pizarro in Peru, Balboa at the Isthmus of Darien, Cortes in Mexico, and along its coast the names of his famous lieutenants will call to mind stirring deeds. At Magdalena Bay, where the big guns will be fired for the first time on the Pacific, they will see the land to which the great conqueror of Mexico gave the name California, which was later made to cover the entire region between the Sierra and the sea. At San Diego they will hear of the brave and earnest Father Junipero Serra, the advance guard of Christian civilization, who founded there the first of the twenty-one missions that linked the fertile region of Alta California to Spain. Monterey will recall the Spanish count whose expedition to that coast in 1602 gave to the bay its name. Sir Francis Drake also sailed along those shores and gave his name, too, to a bay farther up the coast. And the attempt of the Russians, coming down from the north, to take possession of the rich country reaching to the snowy mountains will be recalled by the remains of the old fort built by them near the mouth of what to this day is known as Russian River.

But at Monterey there will be recalled an incident in which was shown the same spirit which has actuated our Navy from the time our first vessel of war touched the water with her keel. California was Mexican territory, though held by the Mexican Government by a precarious tenure. England had long before, as had France, cast covetous eyes upon her rich valleys, and for some years previous to 1846 the former power had kept on the Pacific coast a fleet ready to pounce upon the fair land at the first chance that would offer her an excuse to take possession. The United States also had in view the acquisition of that part of the continent which would round out our territory, and we had at the time on the Pacific coast a small squadron. June 7, 1846, Commodore John D. Sloat lay in the harbor of Mazatlan on the U. S. S. Savannah, and at San Blas, only 82 miles farther from Monterey, lay Admiral Sir John Seymour on the British line-of-battle ship Collingwood. Both were waiting for the opening of hostilities between Mexico and the United States to sail northward and take possession of the coveted country. By special message from Mexico Commodore Sloat received news that the Mexican forces had invaded Texas, and at once hoisted anchor and on the same day was on his way to plant the American flag on California soil. The British admiral sailed on a similar errand the next day, but Sloat beat the Englishman up the coast by two weeks, arriving July 2, while Seymour did not arrive until July 16.

TAKING POSSESSION OF CALIFORNIA.

In the meanwhile Commodore Sloat had taken possession of the country in the name of the United States, and had raised our flag at Monterey July 7, 1846. When the Collingwood sailed into Monterey Bay she was anchored within a pistol shot of the Savannah, which had been joined by the Congress and sloops of war Levant and Cyane. The American vessels had their crews at quarters, and all that was needed was to run out the guns in case the British admiral designed trouble. But none came, for Seymour, though reluctant to acknowledge it, was forced to see that the American flag indeed floated over the town of Monterey, and, boarding the Savannah, grimly made his compliments to the American commodore amid scarcely concealed preparations for action.

"You seem to be about to give your men some practice in the art of gunnery," he said.

"I did not know," said Sloat, pointing to the American flag waving over the town, "but that it would take some practice to keep it there."

"But tell me, Commodore," said Admiral Seymour, "What would you have done had you found the flag of some other nation floating there, and that flag guarded by a ship of the line?"

"I should," replied Commodore Sloat, "have at least fired one shot at it, and perhaps have gone to the bottom, and left my Government to settle the matter as it thought best."

This was the spirit of the old Navy, whose commodore, in his general order before taking possession of the fairest part of our territory, said:

We are about to land on the territory of Mexico, with whom the United States is at war; to strike their flag and hoist our own in place of it is our duty. It is not only our duty to take California, but to preserve it afterwards as a part of the United States at all hazards.

That is the spirit of the new Navy also, as was demonstrated by Dewey at Manila. Admiral Evans's men will find their high ideals of duty, courage, and patriotism already long established by brave deeds on the greatest ocean of the globe.

AN ANSWER TO CRITICISMS OF OUR WAR SHIPS.

I ask unanimous consent to publish in the RECORD as an appendix to my remarks the article which I submit, taken from the Scientific American. I do this for the reason that this is a reply to some of the adverse criticisms on our Navy that have appeared from time to time in some of the magazines of the country.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from California asks that the article submitted by him be printed as an appendix to his remarks. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

APPENDIX.

[Scientific American, New York, Saturday, January 18, 1908.]

The Reuterdahl attack on our Navy.

1.—WHO DESIGNED OUR NAVY? WAS THE SEAGOING OFFICER IGNORED?

The present reply to the recent attack on the ships of our Navy and the men who design them is, it is needless to say, in no sense inspired. It is written purely in the interests of truth, being based upon facts with which we have long been familiar, and most of which have appeared in earlier issues of the Scientific American; and it is devoid, of course, of any personal feeling. When Mr. Reuterdahl states that he is highly appreciative of the American Navy, we believe him—and this in spite of the fact that, if all he alleges be true, the ships of that Navy, under certain battle conditions, would be unable to fire their guns, and must promptly be sent to the bottom. Moreover, we are prepared to admit that some of the points in this article, and particularly those dealing with the bureau system and the scant encouragement shown to the American inventor, are well taken. But having made this reservation, we do not hesitate to say that, from first to last, the article is so full of technical errors regarding the ships themselves—errors which range from slight variations from the facts up to absolute misstatements—that, for anyone who has an intimate knowledge of the material and methods of the Navy, it carries its own direct refutation. But, unfortunately, of the thousands of American citizens who may have read this article not one in ten thousand, probably, has any such knowledge of the facts; and hence it follows that no end of people who have always taken a patriotic and very proper pride in our Navy must necessarily find their faith rudely shaken. Unfortunately, there have not been wanting certain officers of the line who have lent themselves freely to the questioning of the newspaper reporter, and have so far indorsed the general trend of the article as to convey the impression that the whole of it is true; and this in spite of the fact that they must know perfectly well that much of it is a gross exaggeration.

In the first place, then, let it be clearly understood that the present controversy is as old as the Navy itself, and that many of the criticisms now made public have been urged over and over again, carefully debated, and action taken upon them in the secret—and very properly secret—deliberations of the Navy Department. It is the bold publication of the whole matter in an article whose inspiration seems to bear strong internal evidence of being semiofficial that has brought the subject so prominently and suddenly to the wide attention of the public. It is not our intention to enter, in the present issue, into any detailed refutation of the many misstatements made by Mr. Reuterdahl regarding the material—i. e., ships, guns, armor, etc.—of our Navy. This matter we shall take up in a succeeding article. What we wish to do here is to clear the ground and put our readers in a position for judging the question more intelligently, by showing how it has become possible that there should be such an apparently wide divergence of opinion between the men who design our ships and the men who command and fight them. And let it be noted here, very carefully, that we speak of an apparent divergence of opinion, for we shall show that, so far from the seagoing officers having nothing whatever to say about what kind of vessels shall be built, they have been in the actual majority on the many boards that have determined the characteristics of our ships, and on some questions have outvoted the constructors at the ratio of ten to one. The Navy Department has been scrupulously careful to give them every opportunity to express their views and, indeed, has been in the habit of sending out official letters inviting the most frank discussion and the freest offering of any suggestions.

The designing of battle ships and cruisers is without doubt one of the most complicated and difficult tasks in the world—so rapidly do new ideas become old, so swiftly do novel and revolutionary methods become popular. And the naval constructor would be more than human if, in the midst of these everchanging standards and ideals, he should always succeed in building a ship that embodies only those elements which are bound to remain permanent in the years to come. At his best he is but human. He is no seer or prophet. At times he is bound to make mistakes; a fact which, as the official records show, he is perfectly willing to admit.

One serious fault and crying injustice in the whole of this discussion is the fact that the impression has been conveyed, and purposely conveyed, that the work of determining the characteristics of our war ships is exclusively confined to the Bureau of Construction and Repair; that this Bureau is a kind of "close corporation," extremely jealous of its prerogatives and slow to accept any suggestions from the outside, and that it is peculiarly marked by that narrow range of outlook which is supposed to distinguish the purely technical, the "office" man, from the "practical" outside man. Now, the merits of this question are necessarily of a nature which can be determined only by reference to the official records of the Navy Department, in which, fortunately for this discussion, is to be found a full history of the deliberations which preceded the final choice of plans for the ships of our modern Navy.

Who is it, then, that is responsible for the design of our war ships, and what share, if any, had the seagoing officers in determining the characteristics of the ships which a certain clique among them now so freely condemn? There is a provision of the Navy Regulations by which the "general supervision over the designing, constructing, and equipping of new vessels for the Navy" is delegated to what is known as the "Board on Construction," which is composed of the chiefs of the four Bureaus of Equipment, Ordnance, Construction and Repair, and Steam Engineering, with an additional officer of the seagoing branch. The chiefs of the first two named Bureaus are seagoing officers, and these two, with the additional officer above named, serve to place the seagoing element, as compared with the Construction Corps, in the proportion on this board of three to one. That does not look as though the constructive branch had any arbitrary control over the design of ships or that seagoing officers were without adequate representation. Moreover, on the 1st of July, 1907, there were thirty-four seagoing officers serving as assistants in the Bureau of Ordnance and Equipment, and on duty under the Bureau of Ordnance at the Washington Navy-Yard. These thirty-four officers are thoroughly representative of the seagoing branch of the naval service and are in close and constant touch with the chiefs of their respective Bureaus, and advantage is taken of their wide practical knowledge in matters affecting the preparation of new designs. By this arrangement the Board on Construction has the advantage of suggestions born of the practical knowledge of the seagoing officers upon such features as magazine arrangements, ammunition stowage, coaling arrangements, and the location and method of installation of all mechanisms coming under the cognizance of the Bureaus concerned.

Clear proof of the important part played by the seagoing officer in determining the military features of our ships will now be given in connection with the battle ships which have been designed since the Spanish war; and just here it will be well to draw attention to the fact that at the close of the war and at the request of the Bureau of Construction and Repair a special order was issued by the Secretary of the Navy to commanding officers of vessels requesting that those who served during the war make reports as to the operation of their ships, specifying both the good points and the band points and suggesting any improvements which might be desirable. An analysis of the numerous reports submitted indicates that in the opinion of the seagoing officers of that period such defects as existed were not of a serious character. The criticism was the result of the experience, under war conditions, of seventy-five officers; and they were so favorable as to lead the Chief of the Bureau of Construction to state in his next annual report that with regard to the strength, stability, seaworthiness, and maneuvering powers of the vessels of the various classes, the war experience tended to confirm the favorable opinions previously arrived at and to demonstrate the general success of the designs.

At the close of the war the three battle ships of the Illinois class were in course of construction, and encouraged by the results of the war as indorsing the general system of construction, the plans of the new Maine class provided for vessels of the same general character as the Illinois, but with more speed and greater displacement. Thus it will be seen that as far as the military features of the six battle ships of the Illinois and Maine classes are concerned, they were substantially indorsed by the specific reports of seventy-five officers who saw active service during the war, and that they were worked out by a board the majority of whose members were seagoing officers.

The Scientific American holds no brief for the Board on Construction, and we bring these facts before the public simply to correct the absolutely false impression that the determination of the leading features of our war ships is restricted to a single bureau, and that it does not embody the rich and valuable experience of the seagoing officers of the line.

Following the Maine came the five ships of the Virginia class, whose otherwise admirable qualities are marred by the fact that they carry the double-deck turret—one of the most unfortunate mistakes ever committed in any navy. The double-deck turret was nothing new in our service. It was the design of a young ordnance officer which was enthusiastically taken up by the seagoing officers of the line and, because of its theoretical advantages, became extremely popular. It is on record in the files of the Navy Department that the naval constructors, to a man, bitterly opposed the introduction of this type of mounting, and it was installed upon the Kentucky and Kearsarge against their strong protest. They opposed the turret on several grounds, among which were the following: That there was a lack of independent action of the 8-inch guns; that four guns of two different calibers on one single mounting would deliver a less volume and a less accurate fire than if the two types were separately mounted; that the great concentration of weight at the ends of the vessel and the enormous weight on the roller path were objectionable; that the efficiency of four important guns was dependent upon one controlling apparatus, and that the error of one gun pointer enters into four guns.

Unfortunately, after a bitter fight to keep it out of these five splendid ships, the influence of the seagoing officers was successful in incorporating the double turret. In the first plan for the Virginia class, the majority of the Board on Construction proposed an armament of four 12-inch guns in two turrets and eight 8-inch guns in four turrets, mounted amidships; but one seagoing member of the board dissented from the majority report, and recommended that four of the 8-inch guns be superposed upon the 12-inch turrets. This opened up the old controversy of the Kearsarge period, and in order to have the subject well thrashed out, the Navy Department made an addition to the original Board on Construction of eight additional seagoing line officers, thus forming a special board for the purpose. This board approved by a majority report the use of the superposed turret. Later, another special board was convened, consisting of the Board on Construction with the addition of two rear-admirals and five captains; and, as a final result, ten out of the twelve members signed a majority report in favor of installing the superposed turret in the Virginia class. One rear-admiral and the naval constructor signed a minority report. In these two boards the ratio of seagoing officers to naval constructors was, respectively, ten to one and eleven to one, so that the superposed turret must ever be looked upon as the special protégé of the seagoing officer.

The superposed turret, moreover, came very near being emplaced upon the Connecticut and the Louisiana; a minority report of the board which decided on their plans advocating an armament of four 8-inch guns superposed on the 12-inch turrets, and four 8-inch guns in broadside turrets. The final designs for these ships, from which the superposed turret was excluded, were adopted only after an extended discussion, in which the question of the battery arrangement alone was made the subject of report or suggestion by upward of eighty naval officers.

The designs for the following three ships, Vermont, Kansas, and Minnesota, are practically identical with those of the Connecticut, some slight changes being made in the distribution of the armor.

The faults of the two battle ships Idaho and Mississippi are directly chargeable to the mischievous custom of Congress, by which it specifies the limits of displacement of the ships which it authorizes. This was put at the ridiculously low figure for a modern battle ship of 13,000 tons, and on this limited displacement the board was requested to design, forsooth, "two first-class battle ships carrying the heaviest armor and the most powerful ordnance of vessels of their class." Under the circumstances something had to be sacrificed. Four of the five members of the Board on Construction, including two of the three seagoing members, recommended a vessel with battery arrangement similar to that of the Connecticut, but carrying four less 7-inch guns, with a lower freeboard aft, and having one knot less speed, submerged torpedo tubes being also omitted. The Navy Department before approving this report invited an expression of opinion from nine officers of large experience in the Navy, which was duly offered. In submitting its final report the Board on Construction stated that the designs of these 13,000-ton ships did not "represent its opinion of what first-class battle ships should be, nor what the United States Navy should have."

The naval appropriation act of March 9, 1905, authorized the construction of two 16,000-ton battle ships, and the final plans of these vessels, which are now known as the South Carolina and Michigan, embodied the all-big-gun idea. These ships were the first to embody an arrangement of turrets which, although it was subjected to much criticism at the time of its first publication, seems now likely to become the standard practice throughout the navies of the world. We refer to the method of mounting the eight 12-inch guns in four center-line turrets, so as to allow all of the guns to fire upon either broadside. This arrangement, like that of the emplacement of eight 8-inch guns in four turrets arranged quadrilaterally, as in the Oregon, originated in the Bureau of Construction, and it bids fair to be a permanent feature in future battle ships. The excellence of the design of these ships is beginning to meet with the approval which it merits; and we give the following quotation from a well-known foreign paper, which is devoted exclusively to naval matters: "Few, if any, ships are likely to be built in the future which can not use all guns on either broadside. This may be taken as certain. America, in the South Carolina, led the way in this direction, and the ship of the future is bound to be some improved variation of her. * * * There is some good reason to believe that, taking all things into consideration, the South Carolina type is the best all-big-gun ship yet in hand."

The plans of the 20,000-ton battle ships Delaware and North Dakota were unanimously approved by the Board on Construction, the majority of whose members are, as we have seen, seagoing officers. They were subsequently referred to and approved by a special board, the majority of whose members were seagoing officers, and finally were indorsed by special act of Congress.

It will be evident from the foregoing review of the facts regarding the responsibility for the design of our war ships, as recorded in the files of the Navy Department, that the ships of our Navy represent the accumulated experience and critical judgment, not merely of one bureau of the Department, but of the very pick and flower of the personnel of the Navy. Having fully established this fact, we shall, in our succeeding issue, take up seriatim the charges made by Mr. Reuterdahl against the matériel of the Navy, and we shall show that though, in one or two cases, the charges are to the point, they are, as a general rule, grossly in error.

[Scientific American, Saturday, January 25, 1908.]

The Reuterdahl attack on our Navy.

II. ARE OUR SHIPS INFERIOR TO THOSE OF THE LEADING FOREIGN NAVIES?

Replying to our last issue to the charge that the supposed faults in the war ships of the United States Navy are due to the fact that the designing of these ships is confined to a particular board and certain bureaus, and that the seagoing officer has little to say about the matter, we proved conclusively that, so far from his being ignored, the seagoing officer has been in the majority on the various boards which have determined the leading characteristics of our vessels. We showed that our ships, and particularly those built since the Spanish war, embody the ripe experience of the ablest men in the various branches of the naval service. Yet we are asked by Mr. Reuterdahl in McClure's to believe that "the ships of the battle fleet of the United States are in exactly the same condition as the Russian ships at Tsushima;" that the guns, mounted at low elevation, protrude from yawning gun ports, into which volumes of water will pour in a seaway, and through which shells will enter and burst, killing the gun crews, cutting the ammunition hoists to pieces, and blowing up the magazines; that the whole of the thick armor belt is generally below the water line, and that shells would blow in the thinly armored sides above the submerged belts; that our ships are without torpedoes and torpedo tubes, and without suitable guns to fight off the enemy's destroyers, and so forth and so on—the upshot of it all being that our Navy is in no condition to go to war, and therefore, we suppose, must be considered as of practically no consequence at all. In the present article we will take these charges seriatim, and show that, generally speaking, they are either gross exaggerations, or have no basis whatever of fact.

It has long been recognized among naval experts that all criticisms and comparisons of ships, if they are to have any value, must be referred to some common standard, comparison being made only between ships of the same date and the same displacement, and all questions of draft, freeboard, height of guns, etc., being referred to some common water line. The broad underlying fallacy which vitiates not merely Mr. Reuterdahl's article, but the whole of the campaign of criticism of the past few months, is that this essential principle has been largely ignored.

1. Submerged armor belts.—Mr. Reuterdahl states that "of all our battle ships not one shows the main armor belt 6 inches above the water when fully equipped and ready for sea." As a matter of fact, our ships, if we include those now building, show from 18 inches to 11 feet 6 inches of thick armor above the water line when fully equipped. Because the water line of a ship must change with the amount of load she has on board, it is necessary to have some fixed datum to which her displacement, draft, freeboard, etc., may be referred. This datum in our own and the British navy is known as the mean or normal water line. It is the level at which our ships float when they have about two-thirds of their ammunition and stores and about 800 or 900 tons of coal aboard; and it is at this draft that the ship is required to make her specified speed during the Government trials. Thus, in the case of the Vermont, whose designed normal or mean draft is 24 feet 6 inches, the top of the armor belt at this draft is 4 feet 3 inches above the water line, and in this condition she is carrying two-thirds of the full supply of ammunition and stores, and displaces 16,000 tons. At the designed full-load displacement she displaces 1,650 tons more. It takes 63.14 tons to sink the Vermont 1 inch deeper in the water, and hence the addition of 1,650 tons will add 26 inches to her draft. Hence, at full-load draft the top of the belt would be still 25 inches above the water. Similarly, the Maine increases her draft from normal to full-load displacement by 20 inches, leaving 22 inches of the main belt above the water at full load. In preparing for a cruise like that to the Pacific, however, a large amount of extra material is taken aboard, and the last pound of coal is crowded into the bunkers. One of the battle ships now on the Pacific cruise, in addition to spare propeller blades, anchors, etc., carries an extra crank shaft for her engine. But even with this added load the ship in question showed her belt above the water line.

There has been altogether too much wild talk about submerged armor belts, and its absurdity is evident when it is brought to the cold test of facts and figures. A naval officer recently assured the writer that the Virginia not long ago started from a navy-yard with the top of her belt 2 feet below the water. Now, in dissecting this statement, we find that at normal load, when the Virginia displaces 15,000 tons, this mark is 3 feet above the water; so that, according to our informant, she must have sunk 5 feet, or 60 inches, below her normal draft. It takes 60.95 tons to sink the Virginia 1 inch below her normal draft. Therefore, to get her belt 2 feet below the water, she must have taken on board 2,657 tons dead weight, and her displacement must have been 18,657 tons, 700 tons greater than that of the huge British battle ship Dreadnought. This is a fair sample of much of the absurd talk that has been indulged in during the past three months on this question of submerged armor belts.

Furthermore, even if the belts were submerged, which they are not, when our ships start out to fight and find the enemy, the consumption of coal, provisions, water, etc., would bring them up several inches a day, and by the time they met the enemy it is probable that they would be floating not much below their normal draft, with several feet of the belt above water.

2. Low freeboard.—Mr. Reuterdahl has much to say about the "lowness" of American ships, and he would have us believe that the forward decks are much lower than those of foreign ships. He says: "All" (the italics are ours) "modern battle ships in foreign navies have forward decks about 22 to 28 feet above water." We have no space to consider the various foreign navies in detail, and in this reply we will confine ourselves to the acknowledged leader of them all, the British navy. What are the facts? With one single exception, the Dreadnought, there is not a British battle ship in commission with a forward deck 28 feet above the water, all the other modern battle ships being, like our own, three-decker ships—that is, having a berth deck, gun deck, and main or upper deck above the protective deck; and the height between decks being about the same for all ships, viz, from 7 feet 6 inches to 8 feet, it follows that the height above normal water line is approximately the same. As a matter of fact, on several of our ships the height between decks is greater than on the British ships and the freeboard is correspondingly greater. The two photographs herewith shown of the King Edward and the Vermont, selected because the ships are of about the same date of design, show the Vermont to have actually a foot more freeboard on the same normal flotation line. The "draft marks" (figures painted on the side) on the King Edward clearly indicate the position of the normal water line for her known normal draft of 26 feet 9 inches.

3. "Broadside guns useless in a seaway."—The question of freeboard is intimately associated with that of the height of guns above water. Though we have not at hand the figures of freeboard of the British ships, the low elevation of broadside batteries on certain crack British ships as compared with our own proves conclusively that their freeboard must generally be considerably lower, and not, as Mr. Reuterdahl states, considerably higher, than that of our ships of the same date. Therefore, all his pictorial description of the trouble our turrets and broadsides would encounter when steaming in a seaway may be relegated to that land of fiction to which so much of this article belongs.

Not only would "one-third of our guns" not be "useless in a seaway," but the muzzles of the guns would be clear of the water when the eight battle ships of the King Edward class and the two battle ships, Swiftsure and Triumph, to say nothing of the four armored cruisers of the Drake class, would be rolling theirs under.

We have always been a great admirer of Mr. Reuterdahl's marine pictures; and one of the chief elements of their charm, for the writer at least, is their freedom of treatment. The trouble with the present article is that the artist has carried this freedom of treatment into a field from which it should have been most rigidly excluded. The statement that "broadside guns of foreign battle ships and cruisers are, generally speaking, twice as high as ours, and many of them three times as high," would be startling indeed if it were true. As a matter of fact, our broadside guns are as high as the similar broadside guns in the German and Japanese navies, and, as we have seen, are from 2 to 4½ feet higher than those in some of the finest modern battle ships and cruisers of the British navy.

The question of giving ships a lofty freeboard is not as simple as Mr. Reuterdahl seems to think. To add a forecastle deck, raising the freeboard from 20 to 28 feet, means the addition of an enormous weight, and, on a given displacement, involves heavy sacrifices, either in guns, armor, speed, or coal supply. Grave questions of stability are also encountered. We hear much in this controversy about the high freeboard of the French ships. As a matter of fact, there are two schools of design: The French, favoring lofty freeboard, and the British, American, Japanese, and to a less extent the German, favoring a 20-foot freeboard. The British, of whom Mr. Reuterdahl mistakenly gives the impression that they have several 28-foot freeboard ships, were content with 20 feet until the great length of the Dreadnought compelled the addition of a forecastle deck to give her good sea-riding qualities. All this talk about flooded turrets and broadside guns useless in a seaway is no more, and not as much, applicable to our own Navy as it is to the others of the same school. The battle of Tshushima was fought by Japanese ships of the same freeboard as our own and in weather that was described in Admiral Togo's report as "rough." But we have yet to hear that the Japanese broadside guns were "useless in a seaway;" and our broadside guns are as high, if not higher, than theirs.

4. Poor protection for gun crews.—Mr. Reuterdahl's imagination never leads him so far away from the facts as when he comes to speak of the poor protection for gun crews due to overlarge gun ports and the poor subdivision of the broadside batteries. The story of the "enormous" turret ports of the Kearsarge and Kentucky, and the pathetic incident of the "painted wooden canvas screens" has been retailed to the public ad nauseam. As a matter of fact, these turret ports are large only in comparison with the naturally smaller ports which appear in turrets using an inclined face of the character shown on our front-page engraving. The Kentucky and Kearsarge are pretty old ships, as things go nowadays; for their designs were prepared some thirteen years ago. The turret ports were no larger than the necessities of the type of gun mount used at that period demanded. The fronts of the turrets of the Alabama class, which followed the Kearsarge, are inclined, and the ports are proportionately smaller. It is an abuse of the ethics of fair criticism to keep ringing the changes on the supposed poor design of this out-of-date ship, without making any reference to the fact that in all of our later ships the ports have closed in on the guns until the protection is ample. Mr. Reuterdahl is so fascinated with these "yawning gun ports" that apparently he sees double, if not quadruple; for he tells us that "the openings above and below the guns in the turrets of these ships are 10 feet square!" Were this indeed the case, there would be not one square foot of the port plate left, and the Empire State Express could drive bodily into the turret without let or hindrance. Well might "the service journal, the Navy," say that "these ships are not fit for service in battle line against a really modern vessel." In his search for further proof of poor protection for our gun crews, Mr. Reuterdahl goes back to ships that were authorized from twelve to seventeen years ago, and speaks of the broadside guns which "stand glowering from unprotected or badly protected openings as wide as double doors;" but he omits to state that most foreign ships of the same date used the same wide ports, and that many of them, notably in the British navy, mounted their guns in the open with nothing but shield protection. So also he states, by implication, that there is no attempt at isolation of the separate broadside guns from shell fire on eleven of our battle ships, upon which, as a matter of fact, special screen protection has been carefully provided.

5. The open shaft to the magazine.—That Mr. Reuterdahl's criticisms of the open shaft, or well, leading down from the turret guns to the handling room below is well made, is proved by the fact that what is known as the "interrupted hoist," with a floor cutting off the upper from the lower part of this shaft, is being installed on our latest ships. It is only fair, however, to bear in mind the considerations which led to the adoption of the present type of hoist. In the first place, at the period when it was designed, our ordnance officers were anxious to avoid a very serious defect which existed in many foreign ships, and noticeably the British, namely, that the loading could be done only in one position. That is to say, if a ship were firing on the broadside, her turret guns would have to be swung back to the axial position for loading to bring the breech in line with the loading tray and rammer, an arrangement which entailed a great loss of time and a slow rate of fire. Our officers designed a hoist which rotated with the gun and its carriage, and brought the ammunition direct from the handling room to the breech, no matter on what point of bearing the gun was laid. This, of course, necessitated an opening direct down to the handling room. In its later form the hoist was given a high speed of 600 or 700 feet a minute, and it is believed to give a more rapid service and enable a faster rate of fire to be obtained than is possible with the big guns of other navies. The hoist gave great satisfaction, and no complaints were heard until the introduction of smokeless powder developed the danger of "flarebacks." To meet this difficulty the Ordinance Bureau provided gas ejectors for blowing the combustible gases out of the gun before the breech was opened, and stringent regulations were laid down to prevent crowding of ammunition up to the gun in the effort to obtain rapidity of fire at target practice.

Later, an intersecting floor of steel was placed at the mid-height of the turret shaft, with an automatic shutter, which lifted as the charge passed through and then fell by its own gravity, shutting off the handling room from the turret. With a view to shutting off the ammunition room from the handling room floor below the turret, the doors of the ammunition room are provided with circular hinged shutters, and the instructions are that these shutters shall be closed except when a charge is passed through them. Now, it is well known in the Navy that, in the zeal to secure good target records, these safety devices have, at times, been rendered inoperative; and it is a fact that much of the loss of life in the target-practice accidents of recent years would have been avoided had the safety devices been fully utilized, and the instructions for safeguarding the powder been strictly followed. There is one feature in which the hoisting gear of our turrets is subjected to unjust comparison with that of foreign battle ships. The impression may be gathered from Mr. Reuterdahl's description that every foreign battle ship has an independent ammunition hoist, with track, ammunition cars, and cable complete in itself. This is not the case. There is but a single cable, and the auxiliary gear consists of a hand-operated crank shaft geared to the motor shaft, which drives the one cable. Should the motor be short-circuited or otherwise injured, the driving shaft can be hand-operated, but, of course, at only a slow speed. If a shell fragment should cut this cable on a foreign ship, the whole hoist would be immediately put out of business and the turret would be just as completely disabled as our own.

6. Lack of torpedoes and destroyers.—We are entirely in agreement with Mr. Reuterdahl in his belief that our weakness in torpedo-boat destroyers is a distinct menace to the efficiency of the Navy. Congress should make liberal appropriations for ships of this type, which should be of not less than 750 tons displacement and 30 to 32 knots speed. Such boats should be of sufficient strength and freeboard to enable them to cruise with the fleet in any weather. But Mr. Reuterdahl is in error when he considers that the lack of submerged torpedoes in the ships of the Pacific fleet is a serious matter. Expert opinion on this question has been "seesawing" for several years, according as the speed and range of the torpedo, or the range and deadliness of armor-piercing gun fire, have been in the ascendency. In 1903 the General Board, speaking on this question, said: "The range, speed, and accuracy of torpedoes have so greatly increased within the last year or two, that at the present time the torpedo may be considered a weapon of offense to be seriously reckoned with up to 3,000 yards, and even more. Since gun fire, in order to result in a decisive action, must be delivered at a range not greatly exceeding 3,000 yards, it follows that the tactics of fleet actions will hereafter be influenced by the presence or absence of torpedoes." Since that opinion was given, the battle range has increased from 3,000 to 8,000 or even 10,000 yards, as witness the remarkable shooting up to 9,000 yards made by our own Connecticut during the past summer. At such ranges the torpedo becomes an incumbrance, and the space occupied by the submerged torpedo room may much better be given up to coal or stowage.

In concluding this answer to the criticisms of Mr. Reuterdahl's article, and to the general campaign of criticism by which it was preceded, we wish to state that the Scientific American has based its statements upon facts which are either of its own knowledge or gathered from public Government documents. We believe that after a careful consideration of the facts as here presented the general American public will agree with us that our Navy stands second to none in the general efficiency of its ships.

There is one feature, however, in which our ships are superior, and often greatly superior, ton for ton, to the ships of other navies. We refer to the exceptionally heavy armament which they carry. Since the days of the Revolutionary war it has been our aim to mount upon our ships heavier batteries than were carried by foreign ships of corresponding size, and to this policy very largely have been due most brilliant victories, particularly where single ships were engaged. That policy has been steadily followed in the creation of our new Navy, whose birth may be dated from the year 1883. Although Congress has persisted in the most unreasonable practice of stating what the displacement of the ships shall be, the Department has succeeded in equaling the foreign ships in speed, protection, and coal supply, and at the same time has greatly outmatched them in the weight of the armament.

At the conclusion of his speech, Mr. PERKINS said:

I move that the resolution which I presented be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

ALASKA PACIFIC RAILWAY AND TERMINAL COMPANY.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent to call up for consideration the bill (S. 4351) for the relief of the Alaska Pacific Railway and Terminal Company, which was reported from the Committee on Territories. It grants one year's extension of time for the building of a railway in Alaska. The time will expire in the early part of March. In order that the bill may be of any assistance, it is necessary that it should be passed here at an early day.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ACCOMMODATIONS FOR STEERAGE PASSENGERS.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 5083) to amend section 1 of the passenger act of 1882.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Immigration with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 2, to strike out line 13, as follows: "For the purposes of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 14, before the word "In," to strike out "First," and in the same line, before the word "passengers," to strike out "steerage," so as to read:

In computing the number of passengers carried or brought in any vessel, children under 1 year of age shall not be included.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 2, to strike out "statute adult" and insert "passenger," so as to read:

Second. The expression "steerage passenger" means all passengers except cabin passengers, and persons shall not be deemed cabin passengers unless the space allotted to their exclusive use is in the proportion of at least 36 clear superficial feet to each passenger.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 19, after the word "one," to strike out "statute adult" and insert "steerage passenger."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 2, after the word "one," to strike out "statute adult" and insert "steerage passenger."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 7, after the word "one," to strike out "statute adult" and insert "steerage passenger."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 12, after the word "one," to strike out "statute adult" and insert "steerage passenger."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 17, after the word "one," to strike out "statute adult" and insert "steerage passenger."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. I should be very glad to have the Senator from Massachusetts explain the object of the bill. I have no recollection of the bill having been before the Committee on Commerce and being considered by that committee. From what committee does it come?

Mr. LODGE. It comes from the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. NELSON. It relates to shipping?

Mr. LODGE. It relates solely to the space for immigrants. That is all.

Mr. NELSON. What is the effect of it?

Mr. LODGE. The effect of it is to amend section 42 of the immigration act of last year. That is the reason why the bill went to the Committee on Immigration. I will explain it if the Senator desires.

Mr. FRYE. Does it apply to foreign ships?

Mr. LODGE. It applies to all ships carrying steerage passengers to this country.

Mr. NELSON. As I understand, it reduces the cubic space devoted to steerage passengers. It enables the big steamship companies to huddle the steerage passengers in closer quarters than they do now.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is mistaken. It enlarges the space very much over that required under existing law.

Last year there was an amendment to the immigration act enlarging the space, and using the phraseology of our old passenger act. The amendment was very hastily drawn in the closing days of the session, and two years were given to the steamship companies to comply with the provisions of section 42 of the immigration act. It was found, as it became necessary to put the law in force, that the definition of "main deck" was a definition on which agreement was almost impossible with respect to modern ships. The officers in the port of New York, to whom this matter was referred, were divided in opinion as to what constituted the main deck of the modern steamship. If you took the definition that it was the first deck flush from stem to stern, all the company was obliged to do was to make a break in that deck and drop the main deck still lower, and there was therefore no proper limitation to the deck upon which steerage passengers could be carried. It became absolutely essential that there should be a proper definition in the law, so as to prevent steerage passengers being carried below the water-line deck. That is the first thing in the act of last year which makes necessary action at the present time.

The other point was the air space. We enlarged the air space very greatly last year. We carried it not only beyond the act of 1882, but we carried it beyond the air space required under the English law, which was the standard law at that time. We omitted what is in the British regulations, a provision for what is known as "promenade space"—that is, space for dining room and smoking room and space for immigrants to move about. Under the law, as it stood in section 42, it would have been entirely possible for the steamship companies, at the crowded season of the year, to have taken all the promenade space, which is what exists in all the best ships now, and to have converted it into berth space. Our law simply limited the berth space. Under this proposed act, although the air space is very largely increased over the law of 1882 now in existence, and over any air space that we have ever given before, it is not quite so large as that provided in the section of the act of last year, but if you add to it the space in what is known as the "promenade space," and which, under the existing law, could all be absorbed for berth space, you increase the total accommodations for the immigrant. It is simply a somewhat different distribution of the air space.

At the time section 42 was passed last year the British Parliament had appointed a special board of experts to revise entirely the regulations in regard to steerage passengers, and those regulations were not completed until just at the beginning of the present session. They provided, as I have already said, for the promenade space, and the act was drawn with great care. It applies not only to all British ships, but it applies to all foreign ships which touch for steerage passengers at British ports. It is of great importance in an international sense that our arrangements should conform, as far as possible, to the British regulations, which are undoubtedly the best for the modern carrying of steerage passengers. If our arrangements and theirs conform it practically compels all other ships to conform also.

I will just read what the result of this bill is in air space, taking 100 cubic feet as the standard. On the passenger deck, under the French, 100; under the American, the existing act, 100; under the German law of 1898, 100; Italy, law of 1901, 97. Under the proposed bill we have given 127½. On the lowest passenger deck, against 119 for the French, 120 American, 100 German, and 106 Italian, under the present bill we give 153 cubic feet. I have reduced it to cubic feet so as to make the comparison.

On the lowest passenger deck the increase is 50 per cent; on the other passenger decks it is 27½ per cent, and in addition there is the provision for the promenade space, which did not exist at all in our law.

It was the unanimous opinion of the committee that this is a very great improvement on any provision for immigrants that has ever been made in any of our navigation laws or passenger acts. It was also impossible to proceed under section 42, which changed the old passenger act and which proved, as far as the decks went, to be unworkable, and which owing to its arrangement of air space would have made great conflict among the ships.

The effect of this enactment will be to reduce the number of immigrants now brought on the present number of ships afloat from 15 to 21 per cent. Of course they are very much more crowded in the Italian ships than they are in the German, and more crowded in the German and French than they are in the British and the American.

I believe that this is a measure of very great value for the best possible care of the immigrants, and that it will compel the companies which have not given them promenade space to follow the best type of the American and British ships.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT VICTORIA, TEX.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 486) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Victoria, in the State of Texas.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and to contract for the erection and completion thereon of a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States courts, post-office, and other Government offices, in the city of Victoria and State of Texas, the cost of site and building, including vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, not to exceed $100,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5255) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to place upon the pension roll, at the rate per month therein specified, the following-named persons:

Rachel Beatty, widow of William L. Beatty, late of Company A, Third Regiment United States Dragoons, war with Mexico, $12.

Jane Payne, widow of Anderson L. Payne, late of Company K, First Regiment North Carolina Volunteer Infantry, war with Mexico, $12.

Mary Varn, widow of George Varn, late of Captain Hutchinson's company, Florida Volunteers, Florida Indian war, $12.

Owen J. Revels, late of Captain Whitehead's company, First Regiment Florida Mounted Volunteers, Seminole Indian war, $16.

Anna Cochran, widow of Charles H. Cochran, late first lieutenant Seventh Regiment United States Infantry, $25.

H. Rowan Saufley, late second lieutenant Company F, Second Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, war with Spain, $12.

Archibald N. Hogans, late of Captain Hart's independent company, Florida Mounted Volunteers, Florida Indian war, $16.

Emil Kuhblank, late landsman U. S. S. Palos, United States Navy, $12.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move to strike out, on page 2, from line 6 to line 9, inclusive, the following words:

The name of Andrew E. Waterman, late of Company H, First Regiment South Dakota Volunteer Infantry, war with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I also ask, in connection with the bill just passed, for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5254) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent children of such soldiers and sailors.

The Secretary read the bill and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to place upon the pension roll, at the rate per month therein specified, the following-named persons:

Edwin W. French, late captain Company C, First Regiment Connecticut Volunteer Cavalry, $24.

Jerome Crandall, late of Company K, Twenty-sixth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, $30.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move to amend the bill in the paragraph granting an increase of pension to Bridget Murphy, by striking out "twelve" before "dollars," in line 16, page 5, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "sixteen," so as to read:

And pay her a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

I wish to say, in explanation, that the word "twelve" was placed in the bill by error. The report which accompanies the bill shows that a pension of $16 a month was intended to be allowed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FILIPINOS AT MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to call up the joint resolution (S. R. 49) authorizing the Secretary of War to permit not exceeding seven Filipinos to receive instruction at the United States Military Academy.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, in line 7, page 1, to strike out the words "Filipino cadets" and insert "Filipinos undergoing instruction, as," and on page 2, lines 2 and 3, to strike out the words "Filipino cadets" and insert "Filipinos undergoing instruction," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to permit not exceeding seven Filipinos, to be designated by the Philippine Commission, to receive instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point: Provided, That the Filipinos undergoing instruction, as herein authorized, shall receive the same pay, allowances, and emoluments as are authorized by law for cadets at the Military Academy appointed from the United States, to be paid out of the same appropriations: And provided further, That the provisions of section 1321, Revised Statutes, are modified in the case of the Filipinos undergoing instruction, so as to require them to engage to serve for eight years, unless sooner discharged, in the Philippine Scouts.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET K. HERN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2420) granting an increase of pension to Margaret K. Hern, which was, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "sixteen" and insert "twenty-four."

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House, and request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. TALIAFERRO the conferees on the part of the Senate.

IRRIGABLE LANDS IN IDAHO.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 51) providing for additional lands for Idaho under the provisions of the Carey Act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That an additional 1,000,000 acres of arid lands within the State of Idaho be made available to be subject to the terms of said acts, and that the State of Idaho be allowed under the provisions of said acts to purchase said additional area or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purposes and under the provisions of said acts.

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the Calendar number?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Two hundred and fifty-three.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move, on page 2, line 4——

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not understand that the consent of the Senate has yet been given for the consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution has been read for the information of the Senate. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. CULBERSON. Before passing upon that question I wanted to get the number of the joint resolution and see from what committee it comes. I notice now, the reference having been given, that it comes from the Committee on Public Lands. I ask the Senator if it is the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. I notice that there is a report accompanying the joint resolution—report No. 228. I ask the Senator from Idaho if it is a lengthy report? This is quite an important measure, involving a million acres of land.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not distinctly hear the inquiry of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is whether report No. 228 is a lengthy report?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not a lengthy report. I can state the purpose and substance of the joint resolution.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well; I would be glad to have the Senator explain it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was going to propose an amendment to make it in accordance with the language of the act, but I will first state the purpose of the joint resolution.

In Idaho, as in other arid-land States, under the Carey Act, a million acres was allowed to be taken subject to the provisions of that act. It is taken by actual settlers.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I suggest that no portion of the million acres is reserved until it is absolutely entered for settlement and settled upon; so it does not take so much of it as may be used out of the market or devote it to any other purpose than settlement itself.

Mr. HEYBURN. It happened that the arid and semiarid lands of Idaho were particularly adapted to settlement under the provisions of the Carey Act to a larger extent than lands of that character existing elsewhere, and there have already been taken up under the provisions of that act 886,500 acres of the million acres.

Mr. CULLOM. By actual settlement?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. The act provided that each State of what are known as the "arid-land States" should be allowed to take land under the Carey Act to the extent of 1,000,000 acres. The remainder—that is, the difference between 886,500 acres and a million acres—does not leave a sufficiently large area to meet the requirements of the next application for the segregation of lands under that act. As is shown in the report, there are already applications for 685,555 acres on file with the State land board of the State of Idaho in addition to the million acres allowed to be taken by the terms of the original act.

This land is taken up by actual settlers only after the water is made available for irrigating it. The first great project that was accomplished under the Carey Act is what is known as the "Twin Falls project," in what was then Cassia County and is now Twin Falls County. It was absolutely an unhabited country, covered with sagebrush, and it had always been considered as entirely out of the range of possible settlement. But under the terms of the Carey Act a canal over 80 miles in length, 140 feet wide at the top and 80 feet wide at the bottom—I believe I give the figures exactly—carrying from 8 to 12 feet of water, was constructed, taking the water out of the Snake River at Twin Falls. The water was carried on high ground back of the vast area that lay along the south side of the Snake River in what was known as the "Shoshone Falls section." Then, of course, lateral and other canals were constructed carrying the water out all along at proper intervals and distributing it over the tract.

That first tract contained an area of 220,000 acres that has been now enlarged and added to until all the adjacent country, not only on the south side of the Snake River, but on the north side of the Snake River, carrying another 180,000 acres, has been put under water, either complete or under process. The south side, therefore, known as Twin Falls, this uninhabited arid tract of land five years this coming fall, without a single inhabitant upon it, I drove across in going to another section of the State, and the only evidence of the human hand upon it was the construction of a little temporary shanty that was intended for the accommodation of the men who were laying out this project. There is now an assessed valuation of real property upon that tract of more than $3,000,000—that is, upon the basis of one-third—in that length of time. There is a population of 10,000. It looks like an old settled country with its trees, its houses, its buildings, its barns, its orchards, and its stacks of hay that dot the country thickly. You would never dream but what that country had been settled through at least one generation or more.

These canals are constructed by individual enterprise under contract with the State. The State, by the provisions of the Carey Act, makes a contract with an individual or an aggregation of individuals that if they will bring water upon these lands they may have them by paying to the State 50 cents an acre and by the settler paying the actual cost of the water.

Under that act the lands in Idaho on the Twin Falls tract cost the settler $25 an acre; that is, for the water and land. That is true of several of them. There is one, however, on which the cost is $15 an acre, another one $35 an acre, and one $40 an acre. The maximum cost of this land with the water on it—which means forever—is $40 an acre. On the great Twin Falls tract is located the city of Twin Falls, with a population approximating 5,000, with as beautiful buildings as you would find in any city of this country of the same size, with brick blocks and paved streets and all modern improvements that have grown up in five years.

We stand ready in Idaho to carry on this work and to settle up these lands, on which you have looked out from car windows for the last generation or two and pronounced them to be absolutely worthless and marveled that anyone should go to such a country. They are now being converted into green and productive fields and happy homes. We have added to the population of that section of the State, that was marked on the map of Idaho as "Snake River Desert" until I had that designation taken off the map since I came here, because I knew it was not a desert and the people have found out that it was not a desert, that it was simply uncultivated land that was susceptible of the highest cultivation and the most magnificent production.

We ask you to make available to settlers in Idaho another million acres, and we will add another 50,000 to the people of that State when we get that land. It will cost the Government nothing and the Government will gain in settlement and the prosperity incident to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. HEYBURN. I want to amend the joint resolution, so as to make the language conform to the acts referred to. On page 2, line 4, I move to strike out the words "to purchase."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 4, after the word "acts," it is proposed to strike out the words "to purchase," so as to read:

That an additional 1,000,000 acres of arid lands within the State of Idaho be made available to be subject to the terms of said acts, and that the State of Idaho be allowed under the provisions of said acts said additional area or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purposes and under the provisions of said acts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE AT YANKTON, S. DAK.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5133) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the Winnipeg, Yankton and Gulf Railroad Company to construct a combined railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Yankton, S. Dak."

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF SALVADOR COSTA.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1392) for the relief of Salvador Costa.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported by the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 5, before the name "Salvador Costa," to insert "to the heirs of;" and in line 6, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$2,850" and insert "$1,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the heirs of Salvador Costa, of Tallahassee, Fla., the sum of $1,000, for the sloop Mary Lawrence, which was seized and destroyed by the Federal authorities during the late civil war.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of the heirs of Salvador Costa."

MEMORIAL AT POINT PLEASANT, W. VA.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (S. 160) to aid in the erection of a monument or memorial at Point Pleasant, W. Va., to commemorate the battle of the Revolution fought at that point between the colonial troops and Indians October 10, 1774.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $10,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, to aid in the erection and completion of a monument or memorial at Point Pleasant, W. Va., to commemorate the battle of the Revolution fought at that point between the colonial troops and Indians October 10, 1774; but no part of the appropriation shall be expended until the site and plans for the monument or memorial shall be approved by the Secretary of War and the grounds on which it is to be located shall be dedicated to the use of the public and provision made for opening and maintaining an open highway thereto.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

H. R. KING.

Mr. FULTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1702) to reimburse H. R. King. I will state that I do this at the request of the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], who is necessarily absent from the Chamber.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $1,015.58 to H. R. King, of Grand Rapids, Minn., to reimburse him for moneys collected from him on contracts for the cutting of timber in the Indian reservation in Minnesota in excess of the value of the timber.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST-OFFICE BUILDING AT KEARNEY, NEBR.

Mr. BROWN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 4248) to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at Kearney, Nebr.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 5, after the words "hundred and," to strike out "thirty-five" and insert "ten," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at Kearney, Nebr., be increased from the sum of $80,000 to the sum of $110,000, said increase to be employed for the enlargement and decorating of said building.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND IN DONA ANA COUNTY, N. MEX.

Mr. SMITH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1617) to quiet title to certain land in Donna Ana County, N. Mex.

Mr. BACON. I ask for the reading of the report in that case, if it is not long.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from Georgia the Secretary will read the report accompanying the bill.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. FULTON, February 19, 1908, as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 1617) to quiet title to certain land in Donna (Dona) Ana County, N. Mex., having had the same under consideration, respectfully reports the same back to the Senate and recommends that it pass with the following amendments:

On page 2, line 6, strike out the words "issue patents" and insert in lieu thereof the words "cause patents to issue."

In line 4, page 1, strike out the word "Donna" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Dona."

Amend the title by striking out the word "Donna" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Dona."

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, hereto appended, quite clearly explains the nature and object of the bill, excepting that it should be added that the correct name of the county is "Dona Ana" instead of "Donna Ana," as designated in the bill.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 11, 1908.

GENTLEMEN: I am in receipt, by your reference, for an expression of the views of this Department thereon, of Senate bill No. 1617, entitled "A bill to quiet title to certain land in Donna (Dona) Ana County, New Mexico."

Said bill proposes to permit persons who claim land in Dona Ana County, N. Mex., which was originally thought to be in the Refugio Colony grant, but which has been excluded from said grant as finally confirmed and surveyed, to purchase such lands from the United States at the minimum price provided by law, under certain conditions, the bill being substantially in the terms of section 7 of the act of July 23, 1866 (14 Stat., 218), which granted similar relief to persons who claimed land in California in the belief that the land was embraced in a Mexican grant and which land was afterwards found to be public land of the United States.

The bill is in accordance with the views of this Department as expressed in its report on H. R. 18670 of the last session of Congress, which bill proposed to grant the land in question outright to the claimants. Said report is dated February 23, 1907.

On page 2, beginning in line 5, it is provided "and the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall issue patents for the same." Attention is called to the fact that all land patents are signed by the President, by the President's secretary to sign land patents, and countersigned by the Recorder of the General Land Office, and it is suggested that in lieu of the words quoted the following words be substituted, "and the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall cause patents to be issued for the same" or "and patents shall issue for the same."

If amended as suggested, this Department has no objections to offer to the enactment of the said bill into law.

Very respectfully,

FRANK PIERCE, Acting Secretary.

The SENATE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 4, after the word "in," it is proposed to strike out "Donna" and to insert "Dona," and on page 2, line 9, after the word "shall," to strike out "issue patents" and to insert "cause patents to issue," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in all cases where persons have made a claim or claims to land in Dona Ana County, N. Mex., by virtue or under color or bona fide claim of right or title derived from the Mexican land grant known as the "Refugio Colony grant," in said county, and which grant was confirmed by the final decree of the Court of Private Land Claims, rendered in 1902, and where such person or persons in good faith and for a valuable consideration have purchased such lands and occupied and improved the same prior to the rendition of said decree, in the bona fide belief that said lands were embraced in and a part of said grant and which lands were excluded therefrom by the final survey of said grant ordered by said court, and where said persons, their assigns, and successors in interest have used, improved, and continued in the actual possession of the same as according to the lines of the original purchase, and where no valid adverse right or title (except of the United States) exists, such occupants, claimants, or purchasers may purchase and the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall cause patents to issue for the same, after having such lands surveyed under existing laws, at the minimum price established by law, upon first making proof of the facts as required in this section, under regulations to be provided by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, joint entries being admissible by coterminous proprietors to such an extent as will enable them to adjust their respective boundaries: Provided, That the right to purchase herein given shall not extend to lands containing mines of gold, silver, copper, or other valuable minerals: And provided, That whenever it shall be made to appear by petition from the occupants of such land that injury to permanent improvements would result from running the lines of the public survey through such permanent improvements, the Commissioner of the General Land Office may recognize existing lines of subdivisions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to quiet title to certain land in Dona Ana County, N. Mex."

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, February 22, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate February 21, 1908.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 21, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

POLICING NEW OFFICE BUUILDING.

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts, on House resolution 210, providing for the policing of the Office Building; and in order that Members may fully understand the recommendations of the committee, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution and report thereon may be printed in the RECORD, and that the matter may go over until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire presents the privileged resolution referred to, and asks that the same and the report may be printed in the RECORD and go over until to-morrow. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution and report are as follows:

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided by law the following sums as compensation for a police force for the House Office Building, to be appointed by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives: One captain at $1,600 per annum; three lieutenants at $1,200 per annum each, and thirty privates at $1,050 per annum each.

Report to accompany House resolution 210.

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred House resolution No. 210, have had the same under consideration and recommend its adoption with the following amendments:

In line 6 strike out the word "three" and insert the word "two."

In line 7 strike out the word "thirty" and insert the word "twenty-one."

This resolution provides for the appointment of a police force for the House of Representatives Office Building, to consist of one captain, at a salary of $1,600 per annum; three lieutenants, at $1,200 per annum each, and thirty privates, at $1,050 per annum each. The proposed amendment reduces by one the number of lieutenants and the number of privates from thirty to twenty-one, making a total force of twenty-four and a total expenditure for salaries of $26,050.

Your committee conferred with the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House and the Superintendent of the House of Representatives Office Building, and a subcommittee, together with those officers, examined carefully into the needs of the Office Building with respect to a police force, and concluded that the number recommended as above will provide adequate protection.

If the resolution as amended be adopted, it is proposed to place twelve policemen at six doors on the first floor, two at the three doors in the northwest corner of the building at the main entrance opening into the rotunda, one each at the three doors at the other corners of the building, and one at the northwest corner door on the first floor, with two reliefs, providing sixteen hours of service, eight hours for each shift, from 8 a. m. to 4 p. m. and from 4 p. m. to 12 midnight; two officers for night duty, from 12 midnight to 8 a. m., at one of the northwest corner doors, and one at the southwest corner door; six officers on the second, third, and fourth floors, one officer to a floor, between the hours of 8 a. m. and 4 p. m., and from 4 p. m. to 12 midnight, and one officer at the subway entrance from 9 a. m. to 5 p. m. The total force of twenty-one men will be in charge of the captain and two lieutenants.

The salaries proposed are the same as those now received by the captain, lieutenants, and privates, respectively, on the regular Capitol police force.

The Capitol police force proper consists of seventy-three men, sixty-nine privates, of whom two are detailed as special officers (detectives), three lieutenants, and one captain. This force is on duty in the Capitol building and throughout the grounds with two shifts every twenty-four hours, from 8 a. m. to 7 p. m. for day duty and from 7 p. m. to 8 a. m. for night duty, those on night duty working thirteen consecutive hours, one hour of which is made up by the shorter day period of eleven hours, and when night duty is performed a lay off for twenty-four hours follows.

It has been suggested that the regular Capitol police force is sufficient also to protect the House of Representatives Office Building, but your committee find it is impossible to make such an arrangement, for the reason that the regular Capitol police force is fully employed in the building and about the grounds and in the buildings adjacent which are used by the Senate and House, and for the further reason that the Capitol police are under the jurisdiction of both the Senate and House, and therefore, for the purpose of protecting the House of Representatives Office Building, which has no relation to the Senate, that force could not be made available. The House itself must provide for it.

Your committee made inquiry of the various Departments as to the force of watchmen employed therein, the amount of compensation paid, and hours of duty, and append hereto a table giving such information. Compared with the requirements in the buildings occupied by the various Departments in Washington, the number of policemen recommemnded for the House of Representatives Office Building is reasonable. There will appear a difference in compensation in favor of the privates authorized for the House Office Building, the uniform salary for such in the Departments being $720 per annum each, while the amount we recommend for those for the Office Building is $1,050. This amount is recommended so as to make uniform the salaries paid to the regular Capitol police force and the force in the Office Building, and for the further reason that the men will be required to purchase uniforms at their own expense. The men will come from all parts of the country, whereas the men employed in the Departments, as a rule, are residents of the District of Columbia and are in the classified service.

The Sergeant-at-Arms of the House appoints one-half of the Capitol police force, and he will also appoint the force for the Office Building, as authorized by the sundry civil appropriation act of March 3, 1907.

Your committee recommend the adoption of the resolution when amended as proposed.

Statement showing the number of watchmen employed in buildings in the city of Washington occupied by the Executive Departments and in the Government Printing Office, their compensation and hours of duty.

SELECTION OF INDEMNITY LANDS BY NEW MEXICO.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9205 and that it be considered at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of a bill which was read upon a former day and of which the Clerk will read the title, the same to be considered in the House now as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9205) to make the provisions of an act of Congress approved February 28, 1891 (26 Stats., p. 796), applicable to the Territory of New Mexico.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was read, as follows:

To make the provisions of an act of Congress approved February 28, 1891 (26 Stat., p. 796), applicable to the Territory of New Mexico.

Be it enacted, etc., That all the provisions of an act of Congress approved February 28, 1891, entitled "An act to amend sections 2275 and 2276 of the Revised Statutes of the United States providing for the selection of lands for educational purposes in lieu of those appropriated for other purposes," be, and the same are hereby, made applicable to the Territory of New Mexico, and the grant of school lands to said Territory, and indemnity therefor, shall be administered and adjusted in accordance with the provisions of said act, anything in the act of Congress approved June 21, 1898, making certain grants of land to the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes, to the contrary notwithstanding.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

CONSTRUCTION OF LOCK AND DAM AT DALLAS, TEX.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of joint resolution 120.

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 120) authorizing the Secretary of War to apply the unexpended balance of the donation made by the citizens of Dallas, Tex., under the provisions of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1905, to work in construction of Lock and Dam No. 2 in section 1 of Trinity River.

Resolved, etc., That the unexpended balance of the sum of $66,000, donated to the United States by citizens of Dallas, Tex., in pursuance of a provision in the river and harbor act of March 3, 1905, to aid in the improvement of section 1, Trinity River, is hereby made available for the construction of locks and dams, and the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, apply the said balance to work in connection with the construction of Lock and Dam No. 2 in said section 1.

Mr. PAYNE. Reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The request is to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of this resolution and to consider it in the House at this time.

Mr. PAYNE. I will ask the gentleman if this resolution has been reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. It has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. PAYNE. Are these dams to be constructed in the interest of navigation or for private power?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. They are to be constructed in the interest of navigation, authorized by the river and harbor act of 1905.

Mr. PAYNE. They are part of that scheme?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. In 1905 an appropriation was made for this river, with the condition that the citizens of Dallas should donate the sum of $66,000 for certain purposes. Since that time there has been a slight change in the plan for the improvement of the river, and part of this donation fund is not needed for the purpose designated in the act of 1905. In 1907 there was an additional appropriation made for the construction of two locks and dams, and it has developed that there are lacking a few thousand dollars of enough to construct both the locks and dams provided for in the act of 1907.

Mr. PAYNE. This is to be used for the purpose the War Department has in view?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. It is money donated by the people of Dallas for the purpose of improving that river.

Mr. KEIFER. Why can it not be used now?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. The War Department said they would prefer to have a resolution of this kind come from Congress authorizing them to use it for the purpose of constructing locks and dams.

Mr. KEIFER. What was the donation originally for?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. The money was originally donated for three specified purposes—a dam at what they called Old River, another at Parsons Slough for straightening the river, and for the general improvement of section 1.

Now, under the changed conditions it is not necessary, the engineers say, to do all the things contemplated originally with this donation; consequently there is about $37,000 of this money remaining in the Treasury unused for the purposes specified in the original act.

Mr. KEIFER. There was a private donation for a special purpose, was there not?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. KEIFER. How can we change the direction of that voluntary subscription and apply it differently from the purpose for which it was originally paid?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. The donation was made for three specific purposes and then for the general purpose of the improvement of section 1. These locks and dams are in section 1, and form a part of the general improvement of that section.

Mr. KEIFER. Will this resolution divert the donation to other purposes than those for which it was originally made?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. We do not think it will. The War Department, however, report that they prefer to have some specific authorization from Congress before they use it for these purposes.

Mr. KEIFER. My trouble is that I do not see that Congress would have the right to take money donated for one purpose by private individuals and apply it for another purpose.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I will state to the gentleman from Ohio that this money was donated in small sums by hundreds and perhaps thousands of people in and about the city of Dallas.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not see how that changes the question.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. It would be impossible, if it should be required, to secure the consent of all those donors. Some of them are dead, some of them have moved away and their whereabouts are unknown. What is to become of this money if they do not use it for the purpose of the improvement of section 1 of the river, the general purpose expressed in the original act?

Mr. KEIFER. Is any part of the money subscribed yet unpaid?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. No part of the money subscribed is unpaid. All of it was paid in two or three years ago.

Mr. KEIFER. I am very doubtful whether we have a right to do this, but I will not object.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Every citizen of Dallas is anxious that the money be used in this way. The improvement of this river is of vital importance not only to Dallas, but to all of north and central Texas. The freight situation is there most acute and our people are anxious to secure some relief from the oppressions of the railroads, and their chief hope is in securing water competition. The work leading to the development of the river is now well under way, and we are anxious for this work to continue without interruption or delay. When the appropriation of 1907 was made it was believed that a sufficient sum was appropriated to construct the locks and dams then contemplated, but it has developed since that it will require an additional amount about equal to the amount of the unused part of this donation fund. If we are permitted to use this fund for this purpose the work can proceed; if we are denied this right, the construction of one lock and dam will be delayed or we will have to appeal to Congress for a direct appropriation of an additional sum.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. BEALL of Texas, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

HORSESHOE BATTLE GROUND MONUMENT, ALABAMA.

By unanimous consent the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 14378) to appropriate $25,000 to erect a suitable monument on the battle grounds at the Horseshoe, on the Tallapoosa River, in the State of Alabama, and the same was referred to the Committee on the Library.

STREET-RAILWAY EXTENSIONS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 902) authorizing certain extensions to be made of the lines of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company, the Washington Railway and Electric Company, the City and Surburban Railway of Washington, and the Capital Traction Company, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 902—the street-railway extension bill—with Mr. MANN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report. If there be no objection, the Clerk will read the substitute as reported by the House committee.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the City and Suburban Railway of Washington be, and it is hereby, authorized and required to construct and extend, by double tracks, the lines of its underground electric railroad from New Jersey avenue and G street NW. eastwardly to and along Massachusetts avenue, with such northerly deviation as may be necessary to bring the tracks immediately in front of and adjacent to the main entrance of the Union Station, to junction with the existing track at Third and D streets NE. and a single track extension thence to the northwest corner of Stanton square, there to connect with the present track of the City and Suburban Railway; also, by double tracks, on North Capitol street southwardly from the intersection of G street to Massachusetts avenue, to connect with the tracks of the City and Suburban Railway hereinbefore authorized.

"SEC. 2. That the Washington Railway and Electric Company be, and it is hereby, authorized and required to construct and extend, by double tracks, the lines of its underground electric railroad from North Capitol and C streets northwardly along North Capitol street and the new street running northeast from North Capitol and D streets to the Union Station plaza; thence westwardly in said plaza and near to the southern curb thereof to Massachusetts avenue, there to connect with the tracks of the City and Suburban Railway of Washington, hereinbefore authorized, and with the two tracks provided for in section 8 of this act; also a double track extension of its lines from First and B streets NE. northwardly on First street to the Union Station plaza; thence eastwardly in said plaza and near to the southern curb thereof to connect with the tracks of the City and Suburban Railway, hereinbefore authorized, and with the two tracks provided for in section 8 of this act.

"SEC. 3. That the Capital Traction Company of the District of Columbia be, and it is hereby, authorized and required to construct and extend, by double tracks, the lines of its underground electric railroad from Florida avenue and Seventh street NW., southeastwardly along Florida avenue to its intersection with Eighth street east, thence southwardly along Eighth street to Pennsylvania avenue, there to connect with existing tracks of the Capital Traction Company; also a double-track extension from the tracks hereinbefore authorized on Florida avenue southeastwardly along New Jersey avenue to its intersection with Massachusetts avenue and First street west, thence along said Massachusetts avenue southeastwardly to the said plaza, and with such northerly deviation as may be necessary to bring the tracks imediately in front of and adjacent to the main entrance of the Union Station, thence by such route as may be determined by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to the corner of Second and F streets NE., thence east on F street north to Eighth street east to connect with the tracks of the Capital Traction Company hereinbefore authorized; also a double-track extension of its lines from Seventh and T streets NW. eastwardly along T street to Florida avenue to connect with the tracks of the Capital Traction Company hereinbefore authorized; also a double-track extension of its lines from North Capitol and C streets northwardly along North Capitol street and the new street running northeast from North Capitol and D streets to the Union Station plaza, thence westwardly in said plaza and near to the southern curb thereof to Massachusetts avenue to connect with the tracks of the Capital Traction Company hereinbefore authorized; also a double-track extension on North Capitol street from D street to Massachusetts avenue to connect the tracks of said company hereinbefore authorized; also a double-track extension of its tracks from First and C streets NE. northwardly on First street to the Union Station plaza, thence eastwardly in said plaza and near the southern curb thereof to connect with the tracks of the Capital Traction Company hereinbefore authorized, and with the two tracks provided for in section 8 of this act.

"SEC. 4. That the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company be, and it is hereby, authorized and required to construct and extend by double tracks the lines of its underground electric railroad from the intersection of Second and E streets SE. northwardly along Third street to East Capitol street, there to connect with existing tracks of the Washington Railway and Electric Company.

"SEC. 5. That the said street railway companies mentioned in this act be, and they are hereby, authorized and required, within eighteen months from the date of the passage of this act, and it shall be the duty of each of them, to remove their respective railway tracks and appurtenances from the following streets, and at the time of their removal to repair, restore, and make good in all respects the space now occupied by said railway tracks and appurtenances to the satisfaction and written approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, namely: G street NW., from North Capitol street to New Jersey avenue; C street north, from First street east to Fourth street east; D street north, from First street east to Massachusetts avenue; First street west, from C street north to G street north; Sixth street west, from Louisiana avenue to B street north, and Louisiana avenue, from Fifth street west to Sixth street west; and upon neglect or refusal of said companies to remove their respective tracks and to repave, repair, restore, and make good said space to the satisfaction of the said Commissioners within the time above limited, any said street railway company so neglecting or refusing shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be subject to the penalty provided in section 710 of the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia regarding the removal of abandoned tracks, and said Commissioners are authorized without notice to remove said tracks and to repave the space occupied by same and charge the cost thereof to such railroad company, whatever may be the manner or cost of doing said work, and to collect the cost thereof in the manner provided in section 5 of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia," approved June 11, 1878.

"SEC. 6. That the companies hereinbefore named be, and they are hereby, permitted to lay duct lines on such streets as may be necessary for the proper operation of their lines, the location of such duct lines to be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and the cost thereof and all the other costs and expenses of construction, removal of tracks, repairs, and restoration in this act mentioned shall be borne and paid solely by said street railway companies, and they shall be solely liable for all damages to persons and property occasioned by any construction or work authorized by this act.

"SEC. 7. That the construction of the underground electric street railway lines in this act hereinbefore mentioned shall be commenced within thirty days and completed on or before February 1, 1909; and in default of such commencement or completion within said time or within the extension of time by this section specified, all corporate rights, franchises, and privileges of any street railway company so in default shall immediately cease and determine: Provided, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may, for good cause shown in writing, extend the time for completion; but the said Commissioners shall in no case grant such extension for a longer period than six months.

"SEC. 8. That where the route or routes provided for in this act coincide with each other or with the route or routes of existing street railways or street railways hereafter authorized to be operated or constructed, one set of double tracks only shall be constructed and shall be used in common, upon terms mutually agreed upon, or, in case of disagreement, upon terms determined by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which is authorized and directed to give notice and hearings to the interested parties and to fix and finally determine the terms of the joint trackage: Provided, That there shall be only one set of double tracks immediately in front of the main entrance to the Union Station, facing Massachusetts avenue, the most northerly rail being not less than 70 feet from the axis of the south portico of said station.

"SEC. 9. That authority is hereby given the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to use such portion of reservation No. 77 as may in their judgment be necessary for sidewalks and roadways and for street railway use. And authority is hereby given said Commissioners to acquire by purchase or to condemn, in accordance with existing law, for street purposes so much of square No. 626, lying north of the north building line of square No. 567, extended, as they may deem necessary, and the cost of acquiring said property as above shall be paid by the City and Suburban Railway Company of Washington: Provided, That where a portion of any lot is authorized to be acquired as above the said Commissioners may, in their discretion, acquire the entire lot; the portion thereof, when so acquired, lying south of the north building line of square No. 567, extended, to become the property of said City and Suburban Railway Company of Washington as soon as the entire cost of acquisition as above specified shall be paid by it.

"SEC. 10. That whenever, in the construction of the new tracks herein authorized, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia deem it necessary, in order to reasonably accommodate vehicular traffic, to widen the roadway of any street or streets in which said track or tracks are to be laid, such widening shall be done by said Commissioners, the cost and expense of such widening, including the laying of new sidewalks, the adjustment of all underground construction, and of every public appurtenance, shall be borne by the railway company constructing such tracks, and the said railway company shall deposit with the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia in advance the estimated cost of changing or widening the said street or streets, the work to be done by said Commissioners; and whenever at any future time the Commissioners deem it necessary to widen the roadway of any street or streets occupied by the extensions herein authorized, said railway company shall bear one-half the cost of widening and improving such street or streets, to be collected in the same manner as the cost of laying or repairing pavement lying between the exterior rails of the tracks of said street railroad and for a distance of 2 feet exterior to such track or tracks is collectible, under the provisions of section 5 of an act entitled 'An act to provide a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia,' approved June 11, 1878.

"SEC. 11. That whenever in the construction of any of the tracks herein authorized it is necessary, in the opinion of the Commissioners, to improve, by paving or otherwise, the roadway of any street occupied by such track or tracks, said company shall adjust the grade of its tracks to the new grade of the street or streets, the cost thereof to be borne by the said company in the same manner as the cost of paving between the exterior of the tracks of the street railroad companies, as referred to in the preceding section.

"SEC. 12. That the arrangement of all tracks herein authorized within the lines of the plaza in front of the Union Station shall be in accordance with the plans approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and all work of construction and extension herein authorized shall be executed in accordance with plans to be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and under a permit or permits from said Commissioners.

"SEC. 13. That existing transfer arrangements between the Washington Railway and Electric Company and the Metropolitan Coach Company, a corporation of the District of Columbia, shall not be terminated, except by authority of Congress; and unless said Metropolitan Coach Company shall, within one year after the passage of this act, substitute motor vehicles to be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, for the herdics now used by it, its right to operate said line shall cease and determine: Provided further, That all transfers issued by the Metropolitan Coach Company shall be properly dated and punched as to time limit as provided by rules and regulations to be made, altered, and amended from time to time by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and that unless said transfers are so dated and punched the Washington Railway and Electric Company shall not be required to receive them.

"SEC. 14. That the Washington Railway and Electric Company and the Capital Traction Company be, and they are hereby, authorized and required, jointly, to construct, maintain, and operate, by overhead trolley, temporary railway tracks for passenger service from the Union Station to the intersection of either North Capitol street or Delaware avenue and C street north, as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may direct, said tracks to be constructed within sixty days from the date of the approval of this act in accordance with plans approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, said tracks to be maintained and operated by said companies to the satisfaction of said Commissioners, and to be removed by said companies after the construction of the permanent street railway tracks herein provided for within thirty days after notice from said Commissioners so to do.

"SEC. 15. That, except as modified herein, the railway companies affected by this act shall have, over and respecting the routes herein provided for, the same rights, powers, and privileges as they respectively have or hereafter may have by law over and respecting their other routes, and shall be subject in respect thereto to all the other provisions of their charters and of law.

"SEC. 16. That all street railway companies or lessees now operating or controlling, or hereafter operating or controlling, their systems or part of their systems in the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and required, and shall, in said District, make or cause to be made and given, at all times, free, reciprocal, continuous, universal transfers, interchangeable to, from, and over the line or lines of every other street railway company or companies in said District, good and receivable at all junction points, intersections, or connections of every said street railway company with the line or lines of every other said street railway company, for one continuous passage in one general direction for one cash or ticket fare. All said street railway companies are authorized and required to receive, accept, and honor all transfers made or given in accordance herewith, and to carry all passengers transferred without the payment of additional fare: Provided, That all said street railway companies shall sell six tickets for 25 cents.

"The right and use of said transfer shall terminate and become void at the expiration of thirty minutes from the time of the arrival of the car at the transfer point, unless passage be delayed through the failure of the railroad company or companies, or of the railroad companies owning, leasing, or operating the same, to provide transportation within said time, in which case the transfer will be good until transportation is provided.

"The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to enforce compliance with the provisions hereof in any court of competent jurisdiction by mandamus, or other remedy either at law or in equity, in the name of the District of Columbia.

"Any street railway company, or any officer or agent thereof, who shall refuse to issue or receive a transfer, as provided by this section, or who shall violate any of the provisions of this section, shall for every violation thereof be punished by a fine of not more than $100.

"SEC. 17. That no transfer ticket or written or printed instrument giving or purporting to give the right of transfer to any person or persons from a public conveyance operated upon one line or route of a street railroad, or from one car to another car upon the line of any street railroad, shall be issued, sold, or given except to a passenger lawfully entitled thereto. Any person who shall issue, sell, or give away such a transfer ticket or instrument as aforesaid to a person or persons not lawfully entitled thereto, and any person or persons not lawfully entitled thereto who shall receive and use or offer for passage any such transfer ticket or instrument to another with intent to have such transfer ticket used or offered for passage shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $25.

"SEC. 18. That every street railroad company or corporation owning, controlling, leasing, or operating one or more street railroads within the District of Columbia shall on each and all of its railroads supply and operate such number of cars, clean, sanitary, in good repair, with proper and safe power, equipment, appliances, and service, comfortable and convenient, and so operate the same as to give expeditious passage, not to exceed 15 miles per hour, to all persons desirous of the use of said cars, without crowding said cars or the platforms thereof. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby given power to require and compel obedience to all of the provisions of this section, and to make, alter, amend, and enforce all needful rules and regulations to secure said obedience; and said Commissioners are given power to make all such orders and regulations necessary to the exercise of the powers herein granted to them as may be reasonable and proper; and such railroad companies or corporations, their officers and employees, are hereby required to obey all the provisions of this section, and such regulations and orders as may be made by said Commissioners. Any such company or corporation, or its officers or employees, violating any provision of this section, or any of the said orders or regulations made by the Commissioners, or permitting such violation, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000. And each day of failure or neglect on the part of such company or corporation, its officers or employees, to obey each and all of the provisions and requirements of this section, or the orders and regulations of the Commissioners made thereunder, shall be regarded as a separate offense.

"SEC. 19. That prosecutions for violations of any of the provisions of this act shall be on information in the name of the District of Columbia, filed in the police court by the corporation counsel or any of his assistants.

"SEC. 20. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan rose and was recognized.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for one minute, in which to have some proposed amendments read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for one minute.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I desire to have read in my time two amendments which I shall, at the proper time, offer to the bill. I ask that they be read for the information of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Clerk will report the amendments for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, on page 12, at end of line 24, as a new section, the following:

"SEC. 6. That all companies or corporations which now are or shall hereafter be engaged in the operation of street cars within the District of Columbia shall have equal rights and privileges in relation to the passage of street cars over the tracks herein authorized and directed to be constructed upon payment of reasonable compensation for such use. In case of any disagreement between companies or corporations concerning the terms of such use or the sums to be paid therefor, all matters at issue shall be determined by the supreme court of the District of Columbia. In determining what is a reasonable compensation for the use of such tracks no account shall be taken of the value of the franchise of any company or corporation involved in the determination; but such compensation shall be based solely upon the actual value of the physical property used and the reasonable cost of its maintenance."

Amend, on page 18, in line 22, by striking out the word "six" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "eight."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have an amendment read for information of the House.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky desires to have the following amendment read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 18 amend section 16 in line 11 by inserting, after the word "over," the following: "Its own line or lines and;" and in line 12 strike out the word "every" and insert the word "any;" and in line 15, after the word "with," insert "its own line or lines and;" and in line 15 strike out the word "said."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, we have thought that some sections of this bill could be better explained and be more thoroughly understood by use of the map before us. Section 1, page 8, of the bill provides what the City and Suburban Railway Company shall do, and if the Clerk will read the section I will, as he proceeds, point out on the map the proposed extensions. The City and Suburban Railway Company is indicated by the green line on the map.

The Clerk read section 1 of the bill, and Mr. SMITH of Michigan indicated the extension on the map.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Section 2 relates to the Washington Railway and Electric Company, and if the Clerk will read that section I will indicate those extensions. The track of that company is indicated in red on the map.

Section 3 relates to the Capital Traction Company, which is marked on the map in blue. The provision in section 3—is rendered necessary by these facts: At this point on the map the Terminal Company have not been able to get such legislation as they desire to obtain this property. The Commissioners of the District have an understanding with the Terminal Company, the company which owns the Union Station. The Terminal Company is composed of the directors of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company. If the Terminal Company is able to get such legislation as they desire to secure this land mentioned, just east of the Union Station, then the Commissioners hope to be able to arrange so as to go north and east [pointing to map] as instead of California street and First street. The District Committee believe the Commissioners should be authorized to put the tracks there if they are able to make this arrangement.

Thence by such route as may be determined by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to the corner of Second and F streets NE.—

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan a question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KEIFER. Is the plan that the gentleman is pointing out in accordance with the same one that was agreed upon by the committee in the Senate?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, sir; the plan of reaching the plaza is somewhat different from that of the Senate. The Senate bill provides for two sets of double tracks in front of the Union Station and for a set of double tracks around the plaza, not only as indicated on the map, but across in front of it.

Mr. KEIFER. In other respects are the two plans the same?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, sir; the Senate bill does not provide that the Capital Traction or any other company shall build what is known as the "cross-town" line from Seventh and Florida avenue to Eighth and from Eighth to Pennsylvania avenue. Also the Senate bill provides that the Capital Traction Company shall come down Florida avenue and down North Capitol street, and the District Committee believe that as the Washington Electric Company has two tracks on this street, it would be better service to come down New Jersey avenue than it would to come down North Capitol street.

Mr. KEIFER. One other question. I want to know whether the committee have the means of stating that if this bill passes this company will build the tracks?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes. I desire to say that the Washington Railway Company, represented by General Harries, stated that if they were authorized they could not build this extension down Florida avenue and down Eighth street. But the Capital Traction Company, through its representative, came before the committee and asked that they simply be requested so to do and stated that they would be willing to build the extension.

Mr. KEIFER. Another question. In this bill do you propose to grant additional franchises to these companies?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; except as they get the extensions of the streets.

Mr. KEIFER. Do they get new franchises by reason of the authority given by this bill, without any conditions?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They will pay 4 per cent on their gross receipts and pay their share of the taxes on real estate.

Mr. KEIFER. Does this bill grant them franchises that authorize them to enter upon certain avenues and streets?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This simply authorizes them to build on certain streets.

Mr. KEIFER. There is no additional requirement of the traction company in consequence of that additional right to build, is there?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, they will pay their 4 per cent, as I say, and we have put upon them some additional burden in this bill. We are asking them to give universal transfers.

Mr. KEIFER. Ah, I was just going to ask whether that was required of the traction companies—that they shall have universal transfers all over the city.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, that provision is contained in sections 16 and 17 of the bill, which I expect to explain in a few moments.

Mr. KEIFER. I am getting information that I would get from reading the bill. Does that universal transfer apply to the extensions to Georgetown?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, sir.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman to explain what he means by universal transfers.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As I understand sections 16 and 17 of this bill, it is not simply one transfer from one company to another, but, for illustration, if you are on the Capital Traction Company on Seventh street and were going south toward F street and desired a transfer you would get it at F street. Assuming that you desire to go to the west side, for instance, of the market, you would get your transfer at Seventh and F, and you would go west on F street, and then you would get another transfer at the corner of Ninth and F, which would take you to the west side of the market.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Can one get a transfer upon a transfer?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. You may perhaps call that a transfer upon a transfer, and, as I interpret these sections as they are written in this bill, it would give such a transfer as I have explained, as I understand it. Perhaps the courts, if they get an opportunity to interpret those sections, will interpret them differently.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Can not we put it in language here so that there will be no doubt about it, and it will not be left to the court to interpret one way or the other?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. By reading those sections the gentleman will see that they provide for a ride or trip in the same general direction to destination, and in order to do that, it seems to me there necessarily would be a transfer upon a transfer.

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to ask in respect to one matter that is not clear to me. How many tracks does the bill provide shall be laid immediately in front of the Union Station?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. One set of double tracks; in other words, just what there is on Pennsylvania avenue. If there are no further questions, I will ask the Clerk to finish the reading of the section.

The Clerk then concluded the reading of section 3.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state further, in addition to what I have said about the cross-town line, that this new service down Florida avenue and down Eighth street is going to accommodate at least 100,000 people in the eastern part of the city who have no railroad facilities such as they desire at the present time. I will ask the Clerk now to please read section 4.

The Clerk read section 4.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I will say that in this section the word "Second," in line 2, on page 11 of the bill, should be "Third." The Anacostia is to connect from Third street instead of from Second.

Mr. Chairman, these four sections provide for the extensions in the bill. Section 5 of the bill provides for the portions of railway that are to be removed after these lines are completed, and they are, as I will indicate here on the map, on C street and on D street NE., and the track south of the Public Printing Office, and also on First street and on Louisiana avenue. These are in substance the provisions of section 5 of the bill. Section 6 of the bill provides that these railways shall be permitted to lay duct lines down to and including the word "Columbia," in section 6, line 18, page 12, of the bill, and that is the same wording that is found in all the franchises, but the committee, as will be seen, has added some lines there for the protection of the District, as we compel the railroads to do all of this work at their own expense and to be liable for whatever damage may occur. Section 7 provides for construction, and that it shall be begun within thirty days after the passage of the bill, and that the work shall be completed on or before February 1, 1909. And at the further end of the section it provides also that the Commissioners, in their discretion, may give six months' additional time.

Section 8 is an important section in the bill, and I would like to have the Clerk please read section 8 once more, because I consider it one of the most important sections in the bill.

The Clerk read section 8.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Now, I would like to have the Clerk read section 9 of the bill, and I will point out on the map.

The Clerk read section 9.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The members of the committee will see that it is just that little portion there [pointing to map] of square 626 that we seek to get by this bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to ask the gentleman what portion of the reservation referred to in part of section 9 may be taken by these street-railway companies?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. You mean reservation 77?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. By the provisions of section 9 it is—

> Such portion of reservation No. 77 as may in their judgment be necessary for sidewalks and roadways and for street railway use.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, I want to know what portion of this reservation may be absorbed for railway use?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I can only say to the gentleman that the committee visited that reservation with the Engineer Commissioner of the District, and he explained to us if the railway was built down New Jersey avenue and on Massachusetts to the Union Station it would pass through the reservation, and that there would be quite a good portion of the reservation left on each side of the railway track.

Mr. HEPBURN. It is one of the circles.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is one of the unnamed circles.

Mr. HEPBURN. And you propose to allow the road to run through it, instead of around it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, sir; there is a track around it now, and I regard that as one of the most dangerous points in the city. Section 10 is an ordinary provision in regard to street railroad construction; so is section 11. Section 12 provides that the arrangement of all the tracks shall be controlled, of course, by the Commissioners of the District; and I desire to call attention especially to section 13, "that existing transfer arrangements between the Washington Railway and Electric Company and the Metropolitan Coach Company," etc. While there is to-day no written agreement between those two companies, they have been conducting business and making transfers, as perhaps you all know, near the Shoreham Hotel, at the corner of H and Fifteenth streets. There has been an effort from time to time to have those people take off those old herdics and put on the streets more modern means of conveyance. This section provides what shall be done; and in looking over that section, lest there might be some question that this coach company might secure some rights in Sixteenth street, I propose at the proper time to add this proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be held to give the Metropolitan Coach Company any franchise to use any streets and avenues in the District of Columbia.

Section 14 of the bill provides for temporary construction, and it provides that the temporary construction shall be from the Union Station to the junction of North Capitol and C streets, or from the Union Station down Delaware avenue to the junction of Delaware avenue and C street, leaving it in the discretion of the Commissioners of the District. Sections 16 and 17 of the bill are the sections in which universal transfers are provided, and section 18 of the bill gives to the Commissioners of the District control to some extent over the electric railways of the District——

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Does the provision for universal transfers interfere in any way with section 17, providing that the existing transfer arrangement between the Washington Railway and Electric Company and the Metropolitan Coach Company shall not be terminated, except by authority of Congress; do those two sections conflict in any way?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not understand that they do. No, sir. It is not the intention, at least, of the committee to have them conflict.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. For how many years have these franchises to run?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. At the will of Congress.

Mr. SABATH. And you do not put in any time?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is no time limit to the franchises of the street railways in the city of Washington.

Mr. Chairman, if there are no further questions, I would like to inquire how much time I have consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed twenty-five minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I have forgotten what section it was, but there is one section in here where you give to the supreme court of the District of Columbia certain rights, or rather prescribe certain duties which they shall perform in reference to a possible dispute.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is section 8.

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to ask the gentleman if that is in case of disagreement?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Between the railways.

Mr. NORRIS. As to the way in which they shall use the tracks?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, sir. In other words——

Mr. NORRIS. Where they are to be used in common?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In other words, if they can not agree about the trackage, the matter is to be submitted to the supreme court.

Mr. NORRIS. What I wanted to ask the gentleman was, why is it that in that particular section or provision you give this authority to the court and in other cases to the Commissioners? Would it not be better to give the Commissioners in the first instance the right to settle this difficulty, because the court might have to pass upon it in case there was any litigation?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to say to the gentleman that that has been the practice here in the District for some years. Whenever there was a dispute between the railway companies it has been submitted to the supreme court.

Mr. NORRIS. It seemed to me that the duty of the court being clearly judicial, this is giving it authority that is beyond the ordinary authority usually given to a court.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This is in accordance with precedent.

Mr. NORRIS. In case there should be litigation, to what court could the parties apply for a settlement of the dispute? Would they have to apply to the supreme court, whose judges had been the arbitrators in that dispute?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Experience shows there has been no litigation.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Is there any limitation in this bill upon the life of these franchises?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, sir. The franchises of the city are at the will of Congress. There is no time limit fixed, as in most of the cities of the Union.

Mr. CAULFIELD. That is covered, then, by the twentieth section?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan a question with regard to the section requiring universal transfers.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Sections 16 and 17?

Mr. HEPBURN. Sixteen and seventeen. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has examined the legal proposition involved in those two sections; whether the Congress has the power to impose that obligation upon the railways?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, sir. I do not think the committee——

Mr. HEPBURN. Was there any investigation by the committee of that question?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Except in so far as it developed in the hearing, I do not think there was any investigation of the authority.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to ask the gentleman, in view of his knowledge of the conditions, the indebtedness of these various roads, and the revenues that they receive, whether or not he believes that that provision would be sustained by the courts in case the revenues under that were not sufficient to give these corporations a reasonable return upon the large indebtedness that some of them have, without regard to whether that indebtedness has entered into the construction of the roads and whether the stock is watered stock or not?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, so far as the Capital Traction Company is concerned, I have never entertained any doubt but that they could adopt universal transfer and not suffer, but I am not so sure about the Washington Railway and Electric Company and its subsidiary companies. We were not able to get a completed statement from President Dunlop. We heard him but about fifteen minutes, and he frankly said to the committee, and to me personally, in private, that he was unable to give any information that was definite. General Harries appeared for the Washington Railway and Electric Company and said to us the same thing—that it was purely experimental; but they both took the same position that they thought it would be injurious to their companies to have the universal-transfer system adopted.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will ask the gentleman if his committee had the power to send for the books and officers and put them under oath and investigate that subject?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the committee had that power we did not exercise it. Perhaps we ought to have, but we did not. The fact is, I do not think that their books, if we had them, would disclose the facts. We have first got to try the experiment and know what the results would be.

Mr. HEPBURN. What is the gentleman's opinion? Does he believe that this provision which is contained in sections 16 and 17 will stand the scrutiny of the courts? Does he believe that?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I believe it will so far as the Capital Traction Company is concerned; but I am in doubt as to the Washington Railway and Electric Company. I do not believe we will ever know until we try the experiment.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it not true that if it would fail as to one company it would, of course, fail as to both, because there are only two?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There are more than two companies that are to be affected by section 16. The Capital Traction Company and the Washington Railway and Electric Company, which is the parent company of seven other companies in the District.

Mr. NORRIS. You do not treat them as separate companies, do you; you take all the collateral companies?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then there are three other companies. There is the road going down to Mount Vernon, another coming in from Arlington, and another road coming in from Virginia and making connection with the Capital Traction Company.

Mr. NORRIS. These are independent concerns?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Not connected with the Capital Traction Company nor the Washington Railway and Electric Company?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The road in Virginia has made traffic arrangements with the Capital Traction Company, but I do not understand that the two companies are in any way connected.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the gentleman, in his opinion, would it be advisable—that is, would it be fair—for Congress to impose universal transfers upon part of the companies without including all of them?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We have not.

Mr. NORRIS. But suppose as to one of them it should be held to be invalid?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should say that if we are going to have universal transfers at all, let it apply to all.

Mr. NORRIS. Or none.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is right.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Now, these four companies that you have mentioned on which there are granted universal transfers are entirely independent of each other?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, sir.

Mr. DRISCOLL. They are members of the same organization?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Washington Railway and Electric Company, as I understand, controls the stock of the City and Suburban road and several others. In fact, I will read the different lines, if the gentleman desires. The first line is the City and Suburban; the second is the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company; the third is the Washington and Glen Echo road.

Mr. DRISCOLL. These are subsidiary companies?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They are subsidiary lines to the Washington Railway and Electric Company; so when you come to consider what is embraced in the Washington Railway and Electric Company, the meaning of that is that there are seven different roads. The fourth is the Washington and Rockville Railway Company. The fifth is the Washington, Woodside and Forest Glen, and the sixth is the Georgetown and Tennallytown; the seventh is the Brightwood road. These are the seven subsidiary lines.

Mr. DRISCOLL. This bill provides that transfers must be given and received. And it provides for the punishment of any persons who violate this. Now, I want to know just what power there is to regulate the amount that each company shall receive. For instance, one company sells a ticket or a bunch of tickets, and the agent of that company gives a transfer. The other company must receive that transfer and carry the passengers?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. What power or jurisdiction is there anywhere to regulate the proportion between these various companies—if they do not agree among themselves—and to force them to do what is right among themselves so that they may all get their share of the receipts?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the gentleman mean how will the question of transfers be adjusted?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Among themselves; yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. By agreement.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Have the Commissioners any power to adjust these several rights or interests?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They may have, under the terms of this bill.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Suppose they do not agree. Who is going to adjust the matter and force them to do what the bill requires them to do?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the District Commissioners can enforce it.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Have they any power to enforce it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think so; in the courts, under the provisions of sections 16 and 17.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Suppose a passenger tenders a transfer and one of the companies refuses to accept it or to give him a ride upon it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the passenger himself has his rights in the courts under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Against which company, the one that sold him the ticket, or the one that refused to accept the transfer?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. He can take his choice. I know there are some inequalities. For instance, the Washington Railway and Electric Company own 146 miles of trackage in the District and the other company forty-odd miles; but the committee believed that the matter will adjust itself upon the law of averages.

Mr. PEARRE. What is the necessity for the provision of section 13, prohibiting the termination of an agreement between the two companies named in that section without authority of Congress? Does not the section which provides for universal transfers properly cover all that?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The herdic line has no franchise whatever. It simply operates under a police regulation.

Mr. PEARRE. What is the existing arrangement between that company and the railway company?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand it is a tacit arrangement between the coach company and the Washington Railway and Electric Company. They have simply entered into an agreement and it is carried along. I understand the agreement is not even in writing.

Mr. PEARRE. Would it not be well, in the section which provides for universal transfers, to name the coach company, so as to have them covered by it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think not. There never has been any trouble between the coach company and the Washington Railway and Electric Company about transfers.

Mr. PEARRE. I do not know that there has been, but there might be; and in generally covering this subject it seems to me it would be well in this act to provide for it—that the coach company should be controlled by the same regulations as the railway companies with reference to transfers.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As I said, the coach company has no franchise. It simply operates under a police regulation; is licensed just like automobiles, etc.

Mr. PEARRE. It exercises all the rights of a company that has a franchise, because it uses the streets and exchanges with the other companies.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It uses the streets, however, in a different way from the railway companies. It uses them the same as liverymen and other people do who drive teams.

Mr. HEPBURN. I understood the gentleman to say that under section 16, if the railway company refused to honor a transfer, the only remedy the holder would have would be a suit against the railway company, to be instituted by himself.

Mr. SIMS. By criminal prosecution. The other provision was stricken out by the committee. There is no provision authorizing a party to bring suit for a certain sum.

Mr. HEPBURN. But if a passenger should give away that transfer which the company refuses to honor, he would be subject to a fine of $25, would he not, under section 17?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Under section 17. Now, Mr. Chairman, how much time have I consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed forty minutes.

Mr. ESCH. As I understand it, under the Senate bill provision is made for tracks across the south end of the plaza.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; and down Delaware avenue.

Mr. ESCH. But your bill does not so provide.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No.

Mr. ESCH. Was that because you did not wish to have the plaza disfigured by tracks?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; that was one of the reasons.

Mr. ESCH. Was that reason at all influential in controlling the provision for tracks in front of the station on the surface?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senate bill provides for both, but the members of the committee as well as the Members of the House thought it would be unsafe to have so many tracks in front of the station.

Mr. ESCH. My query was whether the committee considered the possibility of a subway from the station?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; but we found it impracticable. The engineer reported to us and appeared before the committee, saying that it was impracticable. If the gentleman will bear in mind the tunnel which goes in front of the Library, and that it goes as I have indicated here on the map, he will see that the tunnel proposition is not practicable.

Mr. ESCH. I can see how that would influence the tracks there, but whether it would influence the tracks coming from the other way I do not see.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We think the people from the northeast, the east, and the southeast would not like to go around to get to a subway on the southwest side, and that is the place where it probably would be.

Then, there is the further objection, we are told, that it would cost eight or ten times as much as it would to put in the surface tracks, and the city of Washington is not large enough yet to justify the expense.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman from Michigan states that there are no terms specified as to the franchise in this bill, so it is really a perpetual franchise?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. So long as the companies comply with the requirements of Congress.

Mr. SABATH. Would Congress have the right at any time to repeal the franchise?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman is sure of that?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have no doubt about it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] has fully explained the trackage arrangement as proposed in this bill which we have reported as a substitute and pointed out the difference between what we think to be the best trackage arrangement as against the bill passed by the Senate. Therefore, I do not propose to take any time upon that feature of the bill.

I do want to refer to one thing in advance, because the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] referred to it, and that is the power of Congress to require these corporations to do what they are herein authorized to do. Two of the corporations referred to, the Anacostia and the City and Suburban roads, as shown by these hearings, are insolvent but are treated as separate corporations. The facts are that the Washington Railway and Electric Company, a solvent corporation, paying the interest on its bonds and funded debt and 5 per cent accumulative dividends on preferred stock of eight and one-half millions, practically owns these two roads as well as others in the District. The report of the City and Suburban Railroad, filed January 31, 1908, shows that the amount of the capital stock is $1,750,000, and that there are 35,000 shares of stock. Of that number the United States Mortgage and Trust Company, trustee, has 25,625 shares, and the United States Mortgage and Trust Company 4,950 shares, or, over 30,000 of the 35,000 shares that is owned by the Washington Railway and Electric Company. This company paid no dividends, and it is stated by General Harries that the stock is worthless.

The other is the Anacostia and Potomac Railroad Company. The total stock is two million. The total number of shares is 40,000. The United States Mortgage and Trust Company, trustee, owns 39,811 shares, just lacking a little of owning it all. That means that the Washington Railway and Electric Company owns it.

I believe, as a matter of precaution and as a matter of justice to these two companies, or at least, to the minority stockholders, that the expense of this new trackage should be paid by the Washington Railway and Electric Company.

I will give another reason for it. In 1900, as I remember, there was a bill brought before the District Committee authorizing the consolidation of eleven railroad companies in the District of Columbia, specifying them. Two of these are the roads here mentioned. There were others and one of them was the Metropolitan road, a very profitable road, paying about 10 per cent dividends. It was stated to the committee that if these eleven lines were consolidated into one company universal transfers would be given over all the lines; that they would be well equipped; that a service equal in every respect on each line would be had, and to that end the bill provided that the Washington Railway and Electric Company should have the power, if a stockholder in either corporation refused to sell his stock at such a price as was reasonable, virtually to condemn the stock through court proceedings to the end that it might acquire it all.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That was in favor of the competing corporations?

Mr. SIMS. It was in favor of the holding company, that they might get all of the old stock held by the stockholders, so that there would be only one company with good service and accommodation and universal transfers.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry as to what was done by the old Metropolitan Company in that behalf? Did they acquire all of that stock, or did they acquire only a controlling interest of the stock in seven of the more important lines?

Mr. SIMS. I was going to come to that. The object Congress had was to authorize and bring about a complete consolidation and unification.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Of all the lines?

Mr. SIMS. Of all those eleven lines, to the end that there might be an improvement on these companies that had no resources with which to make them. It was a very drastic proposition in favor of a holding company, to allow it to condemn the stock of a private stockholder and take it, but we thought, in view of the public benefits to be derived, that we were authorized to go that far, and we did it. Then what was done? I want to state here that it was represented to us at that time before that committee—while those hearings are not printed, nevertheless it is a fact—that Mrs. Leiter owned a block of that stock, about 1,000 shares, the stock of the Metropolitan Railway Company, the good, solvent, paying company, and that they could not buy that stock on any reasonable terms.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Could not buy it on any reasonable terms?

Mr. SIMS. On reasonable terms, privately; and one object of this law was to provide that this holding company should acquire the stock at what was reasonable, and after the law was passed they did purchase at a private sale Mrs. Leiter's stock. How much they gave for it I do not know, but I have always been told it was over two for one, and maybe three. Instead of carrying out the objects and purposes of that act, this company did acquire all the stock in certain roads and changed its name to the Washington Electric Company, and reports today as such, but it left out these two roads mentioned here and the Brightwood and the Tennallytown—every one of them insolvent corporations—and what else was done? These roads were suburban roads to a large extent and they could not afford free transfers, but as soon as this bill was passed the Washington Electric acquired the good, desirable, revenue-producing property and stopped right there, and although they practically own all the shares in the four companies above mentioned and are virtually one company to-day, yet they are operated separately.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. To which companies does the gentleman now refer?

Mr. SIMS. I refer to the Tennallytown, the Brightwood, the City and Suburban, and to the Anacostia and Potomac. While the Washington and Electric owns practically all the stock, it has not done what it said to the committee it would do—acquire all the eleven companies—but it did acquire the stock of the good roads and consolidate them, and through that corporation and through that management it controls these other roads.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is the Washington Street Railway Company?

Mr. SIMS. That is the Washington Railway and Electric Company.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That does not include the Traction Company?

Mr. SIMS. That is the traction company known as the Harries company, and operates a line up and down F street and out to Georgetown and on Columbia road to Mount Pleasant.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is independent of the company the gentleman is speaking of?

Mr. SIMS. Those are a part of the Washington Railway and Electric Company lines. That is the good company.

Mr. SABATH. The Washington Railway and Electric Company owns a majority of the stock in the others, and virtually controls all the others?

Mr. SIMS. Owns practically all and not only virtually, but absolutely controls all the others. Yet they are reported as insolvent corporations, and they are insolvent, and insolvent because of this very ownership and operation. I think instead of requiring the Anacostia to make this improvement, the expense should come out of the real owners, the Washington Railway and Electric Company, which is paying 5 per cent dividends on eight and a half million dollars of preferred stock.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If they own a large majority of the stock in the Anacostia, why does it not come out of them? In substance they pay the whole of it, if you put it on the Anacostia.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURPHY] is going to explain the matter in respect to that. There is a provision in the charter of the Anacostia Company which provides that fares must be reduced whenever the earnings amount to a certain sum, and if we load it down with these expenses it never will reach that amount.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Ah, that is another proposition.

Mr. SIMS. When I asked General Harries at the hearing, "Why does not your company acquire the old outstanding stock of these other companies and report only as one and operate only as one, like the Capital Traction?" he said, "We haven't got the money and we can not get it."

I am not trying to quote his language. Then the very next day in the same hearing he said the outstanding stock in these companies was not worth anything; that the stock was a hole in the ground. I asked him then, "Why, if the stock costs nothing, can not you get money enough to buy when it does not cost anything to buy them?" That is in the hearing and shows for itself. I charge that there can be but one reason for doing this thing as it is done, and that is the continual showing of a deficit in these lines, why they have not been unified, but run and operated as separate roads, although they have the same offices and control, and really the same management, because then it can be said to the people on these lines, "We can not give better service, because these roads are insolvent, and we can not do this, that, or the other, because the company is not paying anything."

Mr. HEPBURN. Did I understand the gentleman correctly to say that the Washington Electric Railroad Company was paying a 5 per cent dividend on eight and a half million dollars of stock?

Mr. SIMS. Preferred stock; yes, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to ask the gentleman if any portion of that stock was used in any way in the construction of any of these roads?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know that I can say whether it was or not, but I can state to the gentleman what was stated in the hearing as to the present outstanding stock of the Washington Electric Company. It is said that this company took the bonds of the preceding company on a basis of $550 bonds of the new company, and $550 in preferred stock, and $200 in common stock, making $1,300 for each $1,000 bond of the insolvent corporation they bought out. Then, being asked the market value of the stock at that time, which General Harries did not give, Mr. Ham, who was present, said that the bonds of the insolvent company were worth about 48 to 60 cents on the dollar. In other words, the old stockholders got in round numbers $600 for what was issued to the present stockholders—$550 in bonds, $550 in preferred stock, and $200 in common stock. Whether there was a dollar in money paid or not I do not know.

Mr. HEPBURN. And they paid $1,300 for $550 in value of the old bonds.

Mr. SIMS. That was the market value at the time. It was for $1,000 face value and, in fact, about $600 in market value. I can see no reason why they do not acquire the small amount of outstanding stock in these companies, because they are paying out in dividends 5 per cent on eight and a half million dollars of preferred stock. When I asked General Harries, "Why did not you do that?" because some of these minority stockholders came to me some years ago and asked me to do something to force that company to buy their minority shares because they were declining all the time and were worth nothing, because the railroad was being operated with that in view, the hearings show the only reasons given were, first, "We did not have the money," and the next was that the stock was not worth anything, and "We did not want to acquire valueless property." In this bill it is provided the insolvent companies shall build a lot of this new trackage.

Mr. GOULDEN. May I ask the gentleman how much common stock was there in the company and what dividends are being paid upon that, or have any dividends ever been paid upon the common stock?

Mr. SIMS. There were never any dividends paid on it. The common stock amounts to $6,500,000.

Mr. GOULDEN. They never paid any?

Mr. SIMS. No, sir. But there is about $13,000,000 of outstanding bonds of this company on which interest is paid.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What rate?

Mr. SIMS. Different rates; probably 6 per cent.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Different issues?

Mr. SIMS. Different issues.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. You mean the average was 6 per cent?

Mr. SIMS. Well, I do not know whether it is or not.

Mr. GOULDEN. How much, in the gentleman's estimation, is water and how much is real value?

Mr. SIMS. I am going to come to that. I am going to do that in connection with the free-transfer proposition. I think it is a proper amendment to require the Washington Electric Company to build all extensions in this bill except that required by the Capital Traction. By so doing we place the burden and expense of this construction on a solvent company that has got the money and are the real owners of these so-called "insolvent companies."

I asked General Harries: "Suppose you acquired this little stock left outstanding, would you not be enabled to pay some dividends on the entire volume of your stock?" He said, "Yes." The contemplated consolidations have not been made, and no intelligent, reasonable excuse is given for not doing so. Therefore we are left to presume that the only reason was that it did not suit the purposes of the holding company to do so.

Mr. HARDY. Do those officers draw salaries from all the companies?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know. Nobody can take those reports and tell very much about them, because they lump the expenses. They do not come out in single items such as salary of superintendent, manager, or vice-president, or anything of that sort. Besides, this same company now owns the Electric Light and Power Company, every single share in it, and it is capitalized at a large amount.

But I want to go now to the next propositions upon which we will perhaps have trouble. One is the free transfer and the other is supervision. I have been advocating a free transfer for several years in this District, on one ticket or one fare. Eleven lines, known as the "Washington Traction or Harries lines," have it between themselves on all lines already. The Capital Traction has it on its own lines, in some instances giving as high as three transfers on transfers. Therefore, the two main companies that will be interested in transfers will be the Capital Traction Company and the Washington Electric. What we call the "Pennsylvania Avenue line" is one, and the "F Street line" is the other, or what was known as the "Dunlop road," because he was the president of it, and the "Harries road," because Mr. Harries is vice-president and active manager, and his name is associated with these other roads. I was not in favor and I am not now, of passing legislation that is unjust and unreasonable and unfair to these roads or to their stockholders. The facts are that none of these roads has ever paid the District of Columbia or the Government of the United States one cent for the privilege of building and operating roads upon the streets and avenues of this city. They pay less tax in proportion to value than any corporation in any city in the United States of which I have been able to get any information.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I understood the chairman of the committee to say that they paid 4 per cent on their gross receipts.

Mr. SIMS. That is correct.

Mr. DRISCOLL. What does that mean?

Mr. SIMS. I will show you in concrete figures.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Four per cent on the gross receipts?

Mr. SIMS. Four per cent on the gross receipts of the road. That is all the tax they pay. It is not a franchise tax at all.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It is an excise tax.

Mr. SIMS. Yes. It is all the tax they pay, except on the fixed real estate, their power house, and so forth.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Their rolling stock and tracks are not taxed independently, but the tax that is paid for that is an excise tax on the operation of the road and figured on the gross receipts?

Mr. SIMS. The tax upon the fixed real estate, like the power house——

Mr. DRISCOLL. The 4 per cent is for franchises and improvements?

Mr. SIMS. The 4 per cent is all the taxes paid, and you can apply it in any way you see proper.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Except the ordinary tax on their buildings, and so forth?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Does that include the track?

Mr. SIMS. No, sir. The Capital Traction Company's reports are so much clearer and so much easier understood that I can be better understood by discussing their reports than I can the other, on account of their involved condition. They own the Electric Light and Power Company as well as some of these other companies. That is, they do not report them as one company. Now, the Capital Traction Railway Company for the last year, which was the report of January 30, 1908, shows that their stock is $12,000,000. Their funded debt, which means bonds, is $2,520,000, or face value $14,520,000.

Now the bonds are selling at $1.10, and the stock—the lowest it has been selling for, I think, in several years—now is $1.17. The cash value, as shown by the sales of the bonds and stocks at this time, following a great panic and money stringency, makes the property worth in the neighborhood of $17,000,000.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SIMS. To be specific, $16,720,000.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. What railroad are you speaking of?

Mr. SIMS. Of the Capital Traction Company. Now, gentlemen, what would be the gross amount of tax to be paid in any State in this Union on a value, in round numbers, of $17,000,000, which is away below the actual value of the stock, because a year ago the stock was selling at $1.42 and above that? Now, at a time when stocks and bonds are at the bottom you can not buy them to-day for $17,000,000. All the tax they pay on seventeen millions of value is $78,110.71. That is all. That includes the 4 per cent in gross receipts as well as the tax on fixed property.

Mr. DRISCOLL. What are the other items of tax made up from?

Mr. SIMS. I have given you all the amounts. The report says "taxes" and includes all the taxes at $78,110. Now, that is all that ought to be considered as taxes, because the wages of the crossing policemen are both for the benefit of the public and the benefit of the railway companies, to prevent accidents for which they would be liable.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is that on the gross income?

Mr. SIMS. Seventy-eight thousand dollars means the 4 per cent tax on gross receipts, on the real estate, and all other taxes. Now, that is less than 50 cents on the $100 in cash value of the property. Where is your farm that is taxed that little for State, county, highway, and school purposes? Where is the city where they are paying as low a tax as that? Now, furthermore, they do not have to pay one cent of tax in this city on intangible property. You can have $5,000,000, or any amount that you can mention of this stock, and you do not have to pay one cent of tax on it. Now, do you tell me that a corporation worth $18,000,000 in round numbers, aye, twenty or twenty-five millions, and that is assessed at 50 cents or less than 50 cents on the hundred dollars in the way of tax liability is being heavily burdened and can not do something in the way of giving a free transfer to other railroads to the end that the public may get just a little advantage arising from the increased revenues coming from the growth of the population and increased use of street cars, without increased outlay or expense?

Mr. GOULDEN. I want to ask the gentleman how he accounts for the smallness of the tax paid by this company in the city of Washington?

Mr. SIMS. Because the good, humane, generous Congress has not required more than that. That is the only way to account for it. And yet we have the officers of this railroad talking about taking this case into the courts if we require them to give a transfer to an unrelated company without additional fare for it. Every charter of every railway in the city is a repealable charter; all the legislation reads that the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act granting the charter is reserved by Congress.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. What are the gross receipts of that company?

Mr. SIMS. I will give them to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY. Does this provision in section 20 cover all the railroad charters for street railway companies in this city?

Mr. SIMS. Yes. Last year the receipts for passenger fares in the District of Columbia on the Capital Traction were $1,736,559.75; Maryland division, $33,649; freight, $1,253; miscellaneous, $2,882; rent of land and buildings, $7,420; advertising, $9,000; miscellaneous, $2,121; income from securities and insurance companies, $7,400; sale of tickets, $3,540; bills payable, borrowed from bond sales for operating, $1,000; renewal fund, $30,000; proceeds of sale of 5 per cent bonds, $2,520,000; or $4,360,000. Now, take the bond issue from that and you have the gross receipts.

Now, what does it cost? What is the mileage of this road? I want to say here that I think the Capital Traction road is well operated, upon the whole. I think they have had too much crowding of the cars on Fourteenth street. I think they have got a lot of little bobtailed cars on Pennsylvania avenue that they ought not to have, followed by trailers. It is true we have an affection for them, because they have been here so long.

When I came here eleven years ago they were following a cable up that line. Shortly after I came here the power house was burned. Then the electrifying of the railroad took place, but these same old cars are still coming up the hill every day. I should feel a little sentimental regret to part with these old specters on Pennsylvania avenue, the little green car in front, with one a little less behind. But outside of a failure to give as many cars on Fourteenth street at times as they should and outside of the fact that they do not seem to be willing to turn loose these old green cars, I have no criticism to make of the service. They pay 6 per cent dividends upon this $12,000,000 of stock and 5 per cent upon $2,500,000 in bonds. Is not that a splendid investment? How much did the stock go down in all these hard times? Let us see what 6 per cent stocks did on the good, dividend-paying railroads of the country that have an established character for value and earnings. Let us take up the Pennsylvania Railroad, which pays 7 per cent, is one of the best roads in the country, known all over the world, and whose securities are a desirable investment wherever a dollar can be raised. One year ago the stock of this 7 per cent road was selling at $132 maximum; this year at $111.50 maximum, or a 20 per cent decline in one of the best 7 per cent stocks in the world, which never defaults in dividends.

Now, take the Louisville and Nashville, one of the best railroad systems in the United States, one of the best operated of roads, in which there is not even the remote possibility of insolvency—a 6 per cent dividend payer. Louisville and Nashville one year ago was at a maximum of $136. At this time it is at a maximum of $95.5, a decline of more than 40 per cent in the 6 per cent stock of one of the best systems of the United States. Take the New York Central, a stock which pays 6 per cent, paid quarterly. A year ago its maximum was $130.5; it is now $95, or a decline of 35 cents on the dollar in five months.

Now, take the Capital Traction Company, which, as shown by the evidence of Mr. Dunlop one year ago, was 141 and 142. Since then they have added a million and a half of dollars to their bonded indebtedness, and those bonds are selling for $110 and are paying 5 per cent interest. That stock, in all these hard times, and with that additional bonded indebtedness, has only declined from 141 to around 120, 12 per cent of which is accounted for by an additional bond burden; and the facts are that the Capital Traction Company stock has fallen only about 12 per cent, has sustained itself better than any railway stock on the face of the earth, steam or electric, city or suburban, that I know anything about.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I wish to ask the gentleman about this question of transfers. Is the gentleman coming to that?

Mr. SIMS. I am coming to that. I am laying the foundation for the justness of that provision. Now, what does this railroad cost? I prefer to read from the illuminating testimony of the late lamented Mr. Dunlop, given a year ago. I read from the hearings of February 6 and 13, 1907, about one year ago, on page 83:

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Dunlop, how many miles of underground road do you have, and how many miles of overhead trolley?
Mr. DUNLOP. Five miles of overhead trolley.
Mr. SIMS. And the rest is underground?
Mr. DUNLOP. Yes, sir.
Mr. MADDEN. How much will the car barns cost?
Mr. DUNLOP. The contract price was about $200,000.
Mr. SIMS. How much did it cost per mile?
Mr. DUNLOP. About $60,000 a mile.
Mr. SIMS. Of single track?
Mr. DUNLOP. Yes, sir.
Mr. SIMS. Without equipment?
Mr. DUNLOP. Yes, sir.
Mr. SIMS. Just to lay the track?
Mr. DUNLOP. Yes, sir. A report will be made to Congress in regard to it in a few days.
Mr. SIMS. It would not cost at most what your capital stock is, would it?
Mr. DUNLOP. My recollection is that it was something over $6,000,000.
Mr. SIMS. Actually paid out?
Mr. DUNLOP. That it would cost something over $6,000,000 to reproduce the plant at the present time. But that would be under all of the scientific appliances of the present day. You must recollect that we have gone through forty-five years' experience. We have been ripped out two or three times, and are apt to be again from the Peace Monument to Fifteenth street, and it is all in the capitalization, the whole cost.

Mr. Dunlop a year ago, when prices were higher than they are now and all building material cost more, admitted that his entire railroad could be reproduced, equipment, power, and all, for $6,000,000, and then its cash market value was $18,000,000 and over at that time and paying 6 per cent on $12,000,000 in stock and $5,180,000 in bonds. Mr. Dunlop said that he received $15,000 a year as president of the road and said he thought he was worth it. I think so, too. I think he was worth it if any man was ever worth it. The fruits of his labor show that he was worth it. How the stockholders could refuse to pay that man $15,000 a year for the work he did for them is beyond my comprehension.

I am not blaming the stockholders of the road because their road cost so much less than they have it capitalized for, but in all justice, the public on this ever-increasing value franchise, that increases year in and year out by reason of the natural growth of the city—the public should have something, whereas they have nothing. Now, then, there is already a free transfer on all the lines of the Capital Traction and all lines of the Washington Railway, and, by the way, the Capital Traction gives free transfers on the Old Dominion, an unrelated company, and all we need is for the two companies to transfer between themselves and the line which comes in from Virginia, which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] proposes to offer as an amendment to make it more certain.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me, in relation to free transfers, did the companies consent to this provision in the bill for the universal transfer?

Mr. SIMS. By no means; they fought it with all the power they had and threatened to go to the courts if we did pass it.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Then this provision was put in the bill by the action of the committee?

Mr. SIMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is it the idea of the committee to finally force all of these corporations into one company?

Mr. SIMS. I can only speak for myself. I think it would be a glorious result if every one of these railroads were in one company and operated as one corporation and save so much unnecessary expense in the payment for unnecessary executive officers.

Mr. DRISCOLL. If this bill becomes a law and universal transfers are put into practice, and after a while trouble arises, does not the gentleman think the result would be a consolidation of all the companies?

Mr. SIMS. If there should be any trouble come of it, it might result in consolidation, but I think the result can be attained without it.

Mr. DRISCOLL. But the gentleman thinks that would be the result, does he not?

Mr. SIMS. If they do not willingly work together, one company or the other, some other company might buy out and unify them.

Mr. DRISCOLL. If the companies are controlling subsidiary companies, they will work together, but if their interests are conflicting they will not work together without friction.

Mr. SIMS. If only one company practically owns them, they can avoid it.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Unless there is some administrative officer or power somewhere to adjust the differences or regulate them, and it is not provided for here, will it not necessarily result in friction and thereafter in consolidation of all the companies?

Mr. SIMS. The object of one section in the bill making certain requirements as to service and placing the power to execute this in the hands of the Commissioners, I think will avoid all of the troubles the gentleman refers to and give the Commissioners, as an administrative board, power to adjust differences.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Have they such power now?

Mr. SIMS. No; because this bill has not become a law.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Nor it is in this bill.

Mr. SIMS. I do not know how far the gentleman might go in construing this provision, but I got the committee to go just as far as it would, and I think as far as it can be gotten through here. I have no objection to the House increasing the power of the Commissioners by a proper amendment if they can attain the object sought.

Now, I am not charging here that this vast capitalization is water, but it is not actual cash value. If there was only one share and it was worth $100, the company would be entitled to reasonable fares.

If they had one hundred millions they would not be entitled to more than reasonable fares, but with the stock issues so largely over actual value, even at the present high prices, or what it was a year ago, how can it be an injustice to these companies to require this service? Now, we have a right to repeal. If any of these corporations refuse to obey and carry out in letter and spirit these requirements, all we have to do is to repeal their charter. I do not think any of them want to invite anything of that sort. In the other company, General Harries says the stock and bonds amount to $31,600,000 and odd, as shown in the hearings. I want to read exactly what he says. I read from the hearings of one year ago, and nothing has happened since that I know of, and there General Harries says that they have—that is, his company, including all of these companies except the Capital Traction—that they have 60 miles of single tracks underground and 86.50 miles of single track overhead, a total of 146.25. The question was asked by Mr. Pou, "What would you put the average of mile of construction, including everything from the power house down to the last item underground?" and General Harries says, "Not less than $122,000 a single mile, including power stations, offices, real estate, feeders, conduits, and all the things that go to make up complete construction—cars and track." Further over he says that overhead trolley, except in New York, is universal, and the cost of the final construction, including trolley lines, tracks, equipment, and everything would be about $45,000 per single track mile.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does that indebtedness of some $29,000,000 cover all of the indebtedness that this company has on all the roads outside of the District, or simply on the roads within the District?

Mr. SIMS. The roads within and without, as I understand it.

Mr. HEPBURN. And the mileage the gentleman has given is what?

Mr. SIMS. Is both within and without—all.

Mr. HEPBURN. But I understand the indebtedness relates only to roads within the District?

Mr. SIMS. No; the indebtedness relates to all of the roads.

Mr. HEPBURN. That would be the 146 miles?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does that indebtedness include the four roads that are not associated with the electric company?

Mr. SIMS. No.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does the gentleman know what the amount of indebtedness is there?

Mr. SIMS. The amount of that indebtedness, bonded and funded debt, is about $5,000,000, on the roads they have not acquired—that is, not acquired by proceedings in court or purchase of all the stock from the stockholders.

Mr. HEPBURN. But, as a matter of fact, they are operating them.

Mr. SIMS. They are operating them absolutely. They have in their treasury $5,700,000 in unsold bonds for the purpose of taking up that outstanding indebtedness of these other companies. Now, taking it as it is, and calculating this 60 miles of underground at $122,000 a single mile and the 86 miles of overhead trolley at $45,000 a single mile, for equipment, power cars, power houses, and everything, it amounts to $11,000,000 instead of $31,620,000, counting it at the high figures that he places it at. That is the Washington Electric Company, understand, so that in that company there is, according to his statement of the cost of reproduction, more than three to one in outstanding stocks and bonds; and yet they say we can not have free transfers without bankrupting and ruining these roads.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Can the gentleman tell us how this overcapitalization came about?

Mr. SIMS. I can not give the details.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. What I want to know is whether it was a legitimate sale of stock at cheap prices at the beginning in order to build them, or was it water, pure and simple.

Mr. SIMS. I want to say this, that in the different reorganizations and changing of names of one company to the other, payments were made in stocks and bonds, and stocks and bonds reissued. I have never been able yet to find where a single dollar was applied to anything, so far as these reports go, since 1900.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. To explain my question, if the gentleman will permit me, I know a railroad, the bonds of which are now selling above par, which ten or twelve years ago was selling its bonds at 82. The result would be that that railroad would have to that extent a bonded indebtedness, which would be greater than the cost of reproduction, and yet the cheap selling of bonds was necessary to finance the road. Now, if the gentleman has any idea how much of this excess of valuation came about in that way and how much is mere reorganization, water, the House, I think, would like to have it.

Mr. SIMS. There were eleven different companies, each company being built up to the condition existing at the time of the bill to consolidate, and, as I said to the gentlemen of the House a while ago, the present company owns these lines, so far as stocks and bonds are concerned, by giving $1,300 of the new for $1,000 of the old, at that time worth $580 on the market. I do not know whether you call that water or not. Colonel Dunlop said when before the committee that the Capital Traction was the Rock Creek road with its name changed. I asked him what was the capital stock of the Rock Creek Company, and he said $200,000. I said, "Did you pay any money when you increased the stock to $12,000,000?" He said, "Not a dollar." It is here in the hearings; but Congress authorized that; they could not do anything without the authorization of Congress. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is a particle of doubt that these railroad companies will accept this free-transfer provision and that it will work all right, and that instead of injuring it will help both companies. It will increase travel.

We know how it is about excursions. We spend more money on excursions than any other sort of travel because we are getting cheap rates of fare and go more on that account. Now, if eleven lines, which were not consolidated and did not give free transfers, did consolidate and give free transfers and improve and increase the growth and net income of eleven lines, and the others, about seven, did the same thing, why will it not be so now when we make universal transfers between these two companies?

Mr. DRISCOLL. I asked you a few moments ago about the power of the Commissioners to compel the various companies to grant universal transfers and accept them, and it was stated here that section 18 gave to the Commissioners power to compel them to do it. Now the eighteenth section goes on and gives the Commissioners certain powers, and in the sixteenth line of that page it says, the Commissioners are given power to compel obedience to all the provision of this section. Now, does that mean the "section," or the provisions of this act? It says, "provisions of this section."

Mr. SIMS. Well, I do not know, but I rather think it ought to be, "the provisions of this act."

Mr. DRISCOLL. If it means the provisions of the act it might go back and give the Commissioners power to enforce the granting and receiving of transfers, but if it means "section," I do not see that there is any power given them to accomplish this result.

Mr. SIMS. I was going to say it can not possibly hurt to strike out the word "section" and insert the word "act." I want to say we provide punishment for failing to give the free transfers. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to use but a very few more minutes of the time of the committee, and that is in regard to supervision. There is no supervision by any authority here over the street railways as to schedules, as to sanitation, as to overcrowding, overheating, or underheating; in other words, to-day they do just what they desire without any kind of supervision. There ought to be some supervision somewhere, some executive authority to carry out all the provisions of this or any other law affecting them. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are the only officers we have now who can do it. When I asked General Harries at the hearing, "Do you object," he said, "Oh, we would not object to the present Commissioners, but we do not know who we will have." Well, that is a great compliment to the present Commissioners, but I believe the future Presidents of the United States will be equal to the task and will appoint Commissioners after these are gone who will be their equal in every respect, and who will do justice both to the companies and to the public; but without some supervision there will be an army of complainants and volumes of complaints every year, as there always is, to Congress.

I believe these or any future Commissioners will act only upon complaint. If the complaint is a just one the railways ought to heed it and remove the cause if the Commissioners so order; if it is an unjust one, I believe the Commissioners will refuse it and that there will be a harmonious service throughout the District by having a unified supervision. I do not see how anything but good over the present conditions can arise from this bill, but I do not object to any amendment that carries out the object of the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to refer a moment to an amendment which is going to be offered——

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. May I interrupt the gentleman? It was suggested that it would be well enough to strike out in line 16 of section 18 the word "section" and insert the word "act."

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. I call attention to this fact: This section says that every street railroad company or corporation, etc., shall "supply and operate such number of cars, clean, sanitary, and in good repair, with proper and safe power, equipment, appliances and service, comfortable and convenient, and so operate the same as to give expeditious passage, not exceeding 15 miles per hour, to all persons desirous of the use of said cars, without crowding said cars, or the platforms thereof." The Commissioners are simply given the power to make necessary rules and regulations to carry out the provisions of this section. It does not relate to any general power, so it would be inapt to alter that section in that regard.

Mr. SIMS. Unless you say "this section" and "this act." Now, Mr. Chairman, my colleague on the committee [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] has given notice that he will offer a 3-cent fare amendment, or eight tickets for 25 cents, with the provisions of the bill all intact except that. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, to the members of this committee that I do not think that will be just to the companies. A 3-cent fare schedule has been operated successfully at Cleveland, Ohio, and perhaps in other places. I think it could be done here with an entire overhead construction. But with so large an amount of these roads with underground construction, which costs double as much, according to the expert evidence of these railroad men—more than double as much—it would not be fair and just to require a 3-cent fare with the high class of service that we seek to bring about in the District of Columbia. I know that the objects and purposes of my colleague are good. He is offering this amendment in the best of faith. I voted for it a year ago. Why? We had to have a bill passed, if possible, in some way, and it was passed under the suspension of the rules, and there was no way to get it through without meeting the views of two-thirds of the membership of the House, and we had no sufficient time to discuss it. But further investigation leads me to believe that such a provision will result in a suit to declare the act confiscatory and unconstitutional, and will be an injury to the service rather than a benefit. With free transfers and with the large area that is covered by the railroads of this District, 5 cents, or six tickets for 25 cents, is not a high fare with the character of service that we think will be given if this bill becomes a law, with supervision vested in the Commissioners.

Mr. Chairman, unless some one wants to ask another question, while I have not covered every phase of the bill, as I do not deem it necessary——

Mr. SABATH. Who is operating these cars that the gentleman spoke of—those old-time cars—that have been doing service here for about thirty or forty years? Which company is it?

Mr. SIMS. The Capital Traction.

Mr SABATH. They could easily afford to pension these cars by this time, could they not?

Mr. SIMS. They might put them in some museum somewhere.

Mr. GRONNA. I understand the gentleman from Tennesseee [Mr. SIMS] to say that Mr. Dunlop, the president of the Capital Traction Company, made a statement that it would cost $6,000,000 to construct all of these roads. Was that the statement?

Mr. SIMS. To reconstruct all the lines and equip them.

Mr. GRONNA. And the indebtedness of these roads amounts to some $29,000,000?

Mr. SIMS. Not his road. The stock of the Capital Traction Company amounts to $12,000,000, and now the bonds are $2,500,000.

Mr. GRONNA. Another question I would like to ask. It is this: I know that the gentleman is on the Committee on the District of Columbia and is well informed. I also imagine that it costs more to construct an underground railway than an overhead railway?

Mr. SIMS. It does—double as much.

Mr. GRONNA. What is the difference in the cost of maintaining these roads after construction?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know exactly the comparative cost of maintaining an underground and an overhead track, but it must be more to maintain an underground track, because they have to dig out below the surface and arrange underground trolley conduits.

Mr. GRONNA. Does the gentleman believe that the companies would be obliged to give the universal transfers if this bill is passed, under the wording of this particular bill?

Mr. SIMS. It is in the language of all the street-car legislation we have ever had—"authorized and directed."

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman concluded his remarks by discussing the question of supervision. Is there any section in this bill, except section 18, that gives supervision to any authority?

Mr. SIMS. Yes. There is a part of a section giving it to the Commissioners—we changed it so often I can not keep track of it—power to determine what is "general direction," and in another place where it says the "transfer shall be in one general direction."

Mr. HARDY. Now, I understand the gentleman personally to be in favor of giving the Commissioners power to enforce the object of section 18, and making that include the entire act.

Mr. SIMS. I do not object to it.

Mr. HARDY. That would give them the power to do so.

Mr. SIMS. I am not going to offer an amendment, because this is the best bill we could get out of the committee. If the amendment does not mean anything more than carrying out the object and purposes of this act, I do not object to it.

Mr. HARDY. I understand that would give to the Commissioners supervision of the entire system, would it not?

Mr. SIMS. I understand it would give them the supervisory power which is necessary to serve the public.

Mr. HARDY. And enforce this entire act?

Mr. SIMS. So far as the public is concerned.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Now, I have listened heretofore with much interest and information to the gentleman, and have discovered that he has a very accurate and comprehensive view of the whole proposition. If he can, in five minutes, I would like to have him tell this committee his plan for solving the difficulties we are now in with the various companies in the city of Washington. If he has a plan in his mind which he would put into effect. had he the power, and can state it in five minutes, I would be glad to have him do so.

Mr. SIMS. I can give it in less time than that. As an individual, my idea would be that you do not want competing roads and companies here, because they can not occupy the same streets, and we now are hearing complaints of this kind. People are making demands on the Washington Railway and Electric Company because they want better service.

Mr. DRISCOLL. You would have consolidation?

Mr. SIMS. The Washington Railway and Electric Company say that they have so much greater mileage than the Capital Traction Company have that they can not give as good service as it does, or as some would suggest they should do. They say also that the Capital Traction Company runs through a more congested part of the city and receives more fares per car and per mile, and therefore they can give better service than they do. There is a comparison between the service given by the two lines all the time.

Now, if all the lines were under one company, with one supervision, included in one management and operation, these troubles that grow out of these ideas of the people, even if they were true, would fade away. Then the cost of management would be decreased to a great extent by removal of the cause for duplicating the general officers and having double expenses. Now, we can not do that by act of Congress. We can pass no bill by which we can say these two companies shall sell one to the other or both to some other company; but I believe that we can have legislation that will tend to such a result in the future, and I believe that the relief lies that way rather than otherwise. Congress always will retain the power to supervise and control the railroads in the District of Columbia. I believe that if we had one company to operate all the roads and complete supervision in the Commissioners or some other body, we would have a more satisfactory service.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is the gentleman in favor of municipal ownership?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, no; if we can get just as good by private ownership.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Under regulation by Congress.

Mr. SIMS. Congress has full power, and there is no unexpired charter rights in the way.

Mr. DRISCOLL. And fix the price of tickets?

Mr. SIMS. Everything; so that it is not confiscatory.

Mr. DRISCOLL. So that they will make a fair income and the good roads will make up for the loss suffered on the poor ones?

Mr. SIMS. A reasonable income on all and a unified splendid service on every line. I am not in favor of governmental ownership here yet; but if in the District of Columbia, in Washington, with the President, the Army and the Navy, and the "big stick," we can not control a few little street car companies so as to do justice to all concerned, we ought to own them and be done with it. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I want to make just one little remark on the question of 3-cent fares. The idea was suggested here that Congress wanted a 3-cent fare. I can state in a few words how that idea originated in the District of Columbia. A few years ago the Old Dominion Railway Company sought, by Congressional action, to build what was called a "cross-town railway" from the end of their line at the Aqueduct Bridge to the Union Station, and to build that identical cross-town railroad up there shown on that map. It was opposed by existing roads. Finally Mr. Cowherd, who had charge of the bill and who was a member of the District Committee, offered an amendment providing for eight tickets for 25 cents and universal transfers over their line, if permitted to build. The Old Dominion Company was owned, as it was represented to us and as shown by the reports to-day, by Senator STEPHEN B. ELKINS and Hon. John R. McLean, two men of great wealth; and the people had no doubt that they were able to do what they said they would do if this franchise was granted—that is, give a 3-cent fare with universal transfers over their line.

That started the 3-cent fare agitation in Congress. Afterward the Capital Traction Company made terms with the Old Dominion by giving transfers over their lines. I do not know what the agreement was, but the Old Dominion Company did not seek further legislation at that time. The two existing companies up to the time that that Congress adjourned were able to forestall the Old Dominion Company in its purposes here, even with great wealth and influence behind it. It was then stated in a conversational way, and admitted before the committee that these gentlemen might then, with their present facilities, construct and operate a line on a 3-cent fare, but that it would be unjust to existing lines that had to carry the capital representing expenditures and experiments of other days which had turned out to be failures.

I only want to state this because there seems to be an idea thrown out here that some Member of Congress is trying to make capital out of this at home; so I thought I would state to the House the origin of the 3-cent fare idea. As I say, the amendment was offered by Mr. Cowherd, of the District Committee, one of the ablest men who ever sat in this House, and who said he was authorized to offer it by the Old Dominion Company, owned and operated by two of the great capitalists of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the District Committee at the outset for the good work it has done in reporting this bill. I realize that it started out to make up the bill under great difficulties. The committee met with serious opposition in its work. It required a good deal of patriotism, courage, and patience to report a bill as broad in its provisions as the one now under consideration.

This bill gives to the people of the District of Columbia more comprehensive accommodations than they have ever before enjoyed. I believe this is the first time that a bill has been reported by any District Committee which has given special consideration to the needs of the people. But while this bill goes a long way in the right direction, it could with greater justice go considerably further. Still it will be hard to accomplish all the good in one inning. So we may reasonably hope that the good beginning made in the bill now before us is but the start of good things that are yet to come. I believe the committee should be encouraged to go on in the good work by receiving from the House a vote of confidence in the passage of this bill.

The universal-transfer provision in the bill is one which the people have long sought. It was said by the railroad representatives during the hearing that there was no demand for universal transfers. Hearings were had by the District Commissioners, at which many, if not all, of the organizations throughout the District were given an opportunity to present their demands for universal transfers. These demands were presented, and resulted in a recommendation from the District Commissioners that any bill passed granting additional rights to the street railway companies of Washington should contain a provision for universal transfers.

This bill places upon the District Commissioners the responsibility of regulating the manner in which the street railways shall be conducted within the District. I apprehend that under the power conferred in the bill the Commissioners would have the right to say how far apart the cars should run on every line. I assume that they would have the right to say how the cars should be ventilated and how they should be cleaned, the character of the cars that should be used, and, if they have that right, I would suggest that they say that no trailers be allowed to run on any street; that only one car shall be allowed to run in one train; that there shall be one conductor and one motorman on every car; that all cars shall be properly heated, cleaned, and ventilated; that no open cars shall be run when the thermometer is below zero [laughter]; that every necessary provision shall be made in order that the people may ride in comfort, and that no enforced condition productive of pneumonia shall be tolerated in the District.

The street car companies' representatives plead poverty. Representatives of great corporations usually do that when the people demand what they should receive at their hands. The people of the District have yielded up their rights to the streets in order that facilities may be furnished to carry them to and fro, and the street car companies are given the right of way on all the streets of the District where their tracks are laid. They have the right to drive the wagons that may be on the street out of their path in order that they may be able to carry the passengers on board their cars to their destination. Great privileges are accorded to these corporations and few concessions have been demanded of them. This is the first time that any concession whatever has been exacted from the street car corporations as a condition precedent to being allowed to carry passengers.

Now, let us see whether the burden which we seek to impose on the street railway companies of the District are onerous. First, it may well be stated how these companies are capitalized, how much railroad track they own. I may say in this connection that the Washington Railway and Electric Company's report shows that the company owns 60.41 miles of road within the District, and 23.72 miles in Maryland, or 84.13 miles altogether; that the length of the double track, including sidings, is only 49.47 miles in the District and 9.70 miles in Maryland. All told, it has 146.22 miles of single-track railway. I figure that 87.5 miles are single-track overhead trolley. The company has outstanding $18,000,000 in bonds, and it is capitalized for $15,000,000 in addition to the bonds. Eight million five hundred thousand dollars of this $15,000,000 is preferred stock. Five per cent dividends are paid on this preferred stock. The annual interest charges on the bonds amount to $749,947.11, and there are $425,000 paid in dividends, making a charge paid out of the earnings amounting to $1,275,000. One hundred and forty-six miles of single track bonded and capitalized for $33,000,000, or $226,000 a mile.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The income the gentleman has just given us does not include dividends on the common stock?

Mr. MADDEN. Not on the common stock.

Mr. NORRIS. That much dividends must be had before the common stock is reached, is that right?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. Let us assume that the overhead trolley construction costs $30,000 a mile—and that is really what it does cost—and the underground construction costs about three times what the overhead construction costs, namely, $90,000 a mile. These figures include the equipment and land. It will be seen that the roads are capitalized for at least two and one-half times what they could be built for, if we assume that these figures are correct. The annual statements, which are not at all clear, show that $1,275,000 per annum is paid in interest on the bonds outstanding and dividends on the stock, or $8,733 a mile of single track.

From the figures that I have been able to obtain from the report, I reach the conclusion that 87 miles of the 146 miles of track was overhead trolley. If my analysis of the figures made in the reports be correct, I would figure the cost of the road as follows, namely: Eighty-seven miles of overhead road at $30,000 would be $2,610,000, and 60 miles of underground at $90,000 amounts to $5,400,000, or $8,810,000, whereas these roads are bonded and capitalized for $33,000,000, making more than four times the cost. Now, of course it is hard and always will be hard for any institution to earn dividends on such a large amount of water—more than is needed to keep the institution moist. If you are going to run a railroad on land you do not need so much water. If you are going to do your propulsion in a boat, of course you need water. [Applause and laughter.]

It seems to me that every condition which will facilitate the carrying of passengers throughout the District in the most comfortable and expeditious way should be exacted from these companies, to whom the Congress grants such valuable concessions, and in addition to that, they ought not under any circumstances be allowed to pay more than a reasonable dividend on the actual money invested in the enterprise. The corporation, given life by the public and furnished facilities by the public, should be forced to so conduct its business that as the earnings increase by reason of the added travel the fares should be reduced. So that, if these companies were compelled to capitalize for just what they have invested and dividends were paid on that amount only, the cost of transportation to the people could be reduced almost every year until it finally reached 2 or 2½ cents a ride. But the street car companies in the District of Columbia are almost on a par with the Metropolitan Traction Company in New York, where it seems to make no difference what the earnings are. The company goes into bankruptcy, and this same condition will prevail here if these companies are allowed to go on issuing bonds and stocks without putting any money into the enterprise. Nothing unreasonable is being asked from them. In fact all that could be reasonably asked is not being demanded.

The annual report of the Capital Traction Company shows that it owns 22 miles of double track, or 44 miles of single track. The company has a bonded debt of $2,520,000 and it is stocked for $12,000,000, making $14,520,000. On the bonds it pays 5 per cent interest, or $126,000 a year, and on the stock it pays 6 per cent dividends, amounting to $720,000 a year, or a total of $846,000 per annum, and in addition to these payments the ordinary repairs of the road, the maintenance of the equipment, as well as the purchase of new equipment, and the necessary extensions of the lines are paid from the earnings. This company with 22 miles of double track, or 44 miles of single track, is capitalized and bonded, as I said, for $14,520,000, or $660,000 a double-track mile.

Mr. SABATH. And how much does it cost to build a mile?

Mr. MADDEN. One hundred and eighty thousand dollars to build a double-track mile of this kind of road, or $60,000 a mile of overhead road. Ninety thousand dollars a mile for single track is, as I said before, considered a reasonable cost for underground electric construction, and experts say that $90,000 a mile is all that it should cost. It will be seen that the capital and bonded debt of this company is four times what it should be, and that instead of earning 6 per cent on the investment, as the report shows, the company is really earning 24 per cent on its investment.

Gentlemen may say that this bill is exacting, but I submit that the rights granted are great and the value that is given to the stock of the company is largely due to the rights granted by the public. I submit that $660,000 a mile for double-track capitalization is outrageous—$330,000 for every mile of single track—and it is paying dividends on that capitalization. We are told that universal transfers can not be exacted from the companies, and that the companies may litigate the question of the right of Congress to legislate on the subject. What if they do? Our duty is clear. We are legislating for the people, and as the people's representatives we should see that the people's rights are protected. I say that this body should exact from these companies every proper facility demanded by the people of the District. I believe that if the companies are compelled to yield to the reasonable demands of the people, they will still have franchises that are invaluable. I believe that no unnecessary reduction of the fares should be made. I believe that we should be just to the companies, but we should demand for the people justice from the companies at the same time. This is a two-sided proposition, and we ought to see that the people's side is given consideration and the kind of consideration that will bring desired results.

The street railway companies' representatives come before committees of Congress with as much assurance as if they owned the nation. They tell the people's representatives what they will and will not accept. They deny the right to a Member of this House to originate legislation. They have become so inured to the belief that they control the situation that when a Representative dares to originate a thought, if that thought be expressed and is antagonistic to their own views, they take exception to it. This bill gives the first notice to these corporations that Congress has a right to originate legislation and having that right it will insist upon executing it by giving to the people through whom these corporations get their privileges the facilities to which they are justly entitled and for want of which they have suffered so long. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARDY. I would like to ask if, in your opinion, all these roads were consolidated would a universal 3-cent fare be sufficient for earning a fair dividend upon $90,000 per mile of single track, and $180,000 per mile of double-track construction?

Mr. MADDEN. I think there is no doubt but that a 3-cent fare would pay a handsome profit on a legitimate capitalization.

Mr. HARDY. To the extent I have named—$90,000 per mile single track, and $180,000 per mile double track?

Mr. MADDEN. But I think it is wise to try what is suggested in the bill at this time, get part of what we should have at first, and then insist on further concessions in the future.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I would like to ask the gentleman to state again what he considers is a fair capitalization?

Mr. MADDEN. I consider that $30,000 per mile for overhead trolley, a single-track line, is the right capitalization, or $90,000 for a single-track mile of underground construction.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Do you know whether or not in figuring the $90,000 per mile for underground trolley construction there is usually figured a certain amount allowed for the cost of the right of way?

Mr. MADDEN. No; that increases the cost of construction.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Your estimate is for construction purely?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Do I undersand you to say you have figures showing it costs as much as that for underground trolley?

Mr. MADDEN. I know that is what it costs.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. The gentleman speaks of a fair capitalization. I suppose he means by that if a road were starting out de novo.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I mean the actual amount of money invested in the enterprise would be a fair capitalization. In other words, I believe that men entering upon an enterprise should invest their money in the enterprise. I do not believe that the sale of bonds from which money is raised with which to construct a street railway is a legitimate investment, but that the money required to construct the road should be furnished by the people who have an interest in the road and who expect to get the profits from its operation.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Exactly. Now, some parts of these roads were formerly horse railways.

Mr. MADDEN. And the way capitalization became so high in this case I suppose is this: There were ten or eleven separate companies operating. Some of these companies were said to be unprofitable. A company was organized known as the "Washington Railway and Electric Company." This company is a holding company. It purchased the stock, or a majority of the stock, in each one of these ten or eleven roads. Whether it paid more than the value of the road for the stock I do not know, but it capitalized the Washington Electric Railway Company high enough to pay for the ten or eleven companies and to have something left for the promoters of the Washington Electric Railway Company, and there is no doubt but that more wind and water can be found in the capitalization of the Washington Electric Railway Company than should be legitimately there. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] desire to occupy any further time?

Mr. SIMS. I have no further requests.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I think it is safe to say that the District of Columbia furnishes the most desirable field for the operation of street railways and suburban railways of any portion of the United States. I have before me a compilation by the Director of the Census showing the single-track cost of construction and equipment, and so forth, of street and electric railways in the States of the United States. The comparison that I propose to make is scarcely fair in this, that the District of Columbia, containing the city of Washington, is of small area, but it is approximately correct, for I have made inquiry with regard to one or two States, particularly Massachusetts, and I have been told by those who are capable of judging that fully 80 per cent of all the population of that State is within convenient distance of a street railway. I find from this table that the District of Columbia, treating it as a State, leads the entire column in the number of fare passengers per mile of single track. It stands at the head. A larger number of passengers per mile are carried in the District of Columbia than in any of the States of this Union. That great number is 403,485 paying passengers—that is, fare passengers—per mile of single track. It is also at the head of the column in the number——

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption right there?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Is that per year?

Mr. HEPBURN. For a year—yes, sir; by States, for 1902. The State that next approaches is the State of New York, with 407,305; then the State of Massachusetts with 182,822; and the State of Illinois with 287,035. So that, with the exception of the State of New York—and you will remember the large number of populous cities in that State supplied with street railway facilities—the District of Columbia is far ahead of all the other States, more than 100,000 ahead of the one that nearest approaches it. The number of persons who ride, including old and young, in all of these States is, in the District of Columbia, 237. That is, the number of rides that each inhabitant, little and big, takes each year. The nearest approach to that is the State of Massachusetts, with 165, as against 237 in the District of Columbia. In the State of New York the number is 157; in the State of Illinois, with its numerous populous cities, only 96. So that the patronage that the roads are receiving per capita is far in excess of that in all of the other subdivisions of the United States. These figures show the value of a railway franchise in the District of Columbia as compared with any other locality in the United States. Another thing to be taken into account is the facility of movement that the railways have in this city as compared with any other that I know of. The streets here are wide. It is not a commercial city. There is but little interference with their movements. Compare Pennsylvania avenue, for instance, with Broadway, New York. There are no delays here. There is nothing in the way of added expense because of interruption to their business.

These franchises are given to the railways with a tax of 4 per cent upon their gross earnings, in connection with another system of taxation that is most favorable to them, as was shown by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. In other words, they pay here but a little over 4 mills on the dollar as tax for every form of taxation. And then again, the holders of their securities, who reside here, pay no tax whatever upon those securities, for personal property of that character is not taxed in the District. So that from every viewpoint of that character they are most favorably dealt with, and the franchises are, in comparative value, far greater than those anywhere else.

I want to call attention to the further fact that there has been an almost criminal negligence upon the part of Congress with regard to their organization. There are no limitations, or practically no limitations, upon the amount of stocks and bonds that they may issue. And under this favorable legislation they have been able to construct their roads so that not a dollar of investment, necessarily, is made by any man who built these ways, of his own money. They have been allowed to issue bonds vastly superior in amount to the cost of the road, and leaving all of their stock as a mere gratuity. These roads have not been built with the money of the men who hold them. They have been built through the agency of bonds, and the stock has been a gratuity that has been given as a bonus to those who furnished the money. So that these gentlemen are not here in the attitude of those who have been abused, or who have been great sufferers, or who have been charitable in a great degree to the people of the city, intent as they might claim upon doing beneficial things for their fellow-citizens. They have gone into these enterprises for the money that was in them, and surely we will not quarrel with that. They have been able to so finance them that they have cost them no money, and they are now reaping a reward where they have rendered but little service, so that they do not appeal particularly to my compassion.

Now, the bill that is under consideration, I want you gentlemen to remember, is a bill conferring still further gratuities upon them, giving them still further of the valuable franchises of this city. We are not asking them to do anything. They are here as suppliants for favor. It is true that they talk about additional burdens; but there will be no difficulty in finding corporations that will be glad to buy everything and pay for every franchise that we are now additionally conferring on them.

There is a feature in this bill that I do not take very kindly to. In the first place, a system of universal transfers is not, to my mind, the relief that should be given to the people. I believe that every man should pay for what he gets. Now, the average person who rides in this city rides a distance of less than a mile. That man who rides a mile ought to pay for a mile; that man who rides 10 miles ought to pay for 10 miles. Then you would be putting everybody on an equality with regard to the service that he receives or the benefit that is conferred upon him. The proposition of the bill is illogical; it is not a scientific way of disposing of this question. I have another objecton to it. I fear that this legislation will be entirely nugatory. I know that there are gentlemen who say there is no question, there is not a doubt but that this method of imposing an obligation upon the companies is entirely within the powers of Congress. I very much doubt it.

I do not believe that with the capitalization of the Washington Railway and Electric Company, for instance, this system will yield such a revenue as the courts will hold they are entitled to; and if it fails as to one it fails as to all, because it must be reciprocal in its application to all the roads if the people are to have benefit from any. Nobody knows yet. We do know that the courts have said that a public-service corporation is entitled to earn that sum which will pay all of the operating expenses and will yield a fair dividend upon the moneys involved. Now, what are the moneys involved? Are they evidenced by the obligations of the company and by the capitalization of the company, or simply those sums that were actually invested? In other words, will the court squeeze out the water? Nobody can say. Suppose they do not. Suppose they listen to the plea of a man who is an innocent holder, who has had no part or parcel in the wrongs of overcapitalization, who has paid full value for the securities that he holds. Who is able to say that that plea will not be listened to by the courts? Suppose that plea is listened to. Then, if they are entitled to a fair compensation upon the capital as measured in this way by the issues of the corporation—the very condition here—who will say that the present revenues, or the revenues that are probable within a reasonable time, will meet those requirements?

What benefit will the people get from that? I know that gentlemen say there is nothing in this theory. We have got the power to do whatever we choose with them, because of the reservation and power to amend their charters. Can we amend the charter so as to impose a hardship upon them—a destructive hardship, a hardship in the nature of a confiscation of their property? I think there will be some limitation placed upon that power when the courts come to construe. If so, then there is nothing in this bill that the people are interested in. No great advantage to the people here, except it be this provision that gets the passengers from C street down to the depot. Not a very great boon. There is but little in that. The distance is a short one. The inconvenience is inconsiderable. But there are provisions in the bill that, with slight amendments, it seems to me, may be effective of good, and that is the reason why I am willing to support the whole bill in order to get those provisions. The great demand of the people in this District and the demand of justice is that these companies should perform their duties. The gentleman from Tennessee has said with much of truth that one of the companies here does render reasonably fair service—not perfect service, because there are times when their cars are overcrowded to such a degree that no one who rides upon such a car can have a comfortable, expeditious passage, which he pays for and has a right to demand. But there are some other roads the service on which is simply intolerable, especially that line of the Washington Railway and Electric Company that is known as the "F street line," which has been referred to, that leads out from the extreme eastern portion of the city to Georgetown.

The same thing is true of the Mount Pleasant line of the same company.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have already in the presence of this House adverted to some of the palpable outrages that that company is daily, almost hourly, perpetrating upon the people of this District. [Applause.] The service is absolutely abominable. The man who authorizes it is guilty of a crime. All this winter they have been running open cars in this city. We read about the great number of people suffering from pneumonia and similar diseases. A great portion of the time their closed cars are not heated. The cars are old, dilapidated, and inadequate. I have not seen half a dozen cars on that line in the last three months that ought not to be condemned, and would be where there was a decent service. Now, there is no excuse for that. These people have an abundance of means, although they are constantly pleading poverty. They say they have not the money to buy new cars. Why, they have had money enough to pay 5 per cent dividends on eight and one-half million dollars of watered stock. [Applause.] They had the money to do that. They have the money to pay high salaries, although they starve many of their employees. Now, I think that matter ought to be righted, and when the opportunity comes I intend to offer a substitute for section 18, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That every street railroad company operating one or more railroads within the District of Columbia shall on each and all of its railroads supply and operate such number of cars as will give comfortable, convenient, and expeditious passage to all persons desirous of the use of said cars. All such cars shall be clean, in good repair, and in good sanitary condition, and shall be supplied and operated with such frequency as to prevent crowding of either car or platform. It is hereby made the special duty of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to require and compel obedience to all of the provisions of this section, and to this end said Commissioners shall have authority to make and enforce all needful rules and regulations to secure obedience to the requirements herein contained, and to make such changes in the time cards or time schedules adopted by any railroad company, or to make such orders relating to the character and condition of the cars operated, or the time, manner, or frequency of their operations, as to said Commissioners may seem proper; and such railroad companies, their officers and employees, are hereby required to obey all of the provisions of this section, and such regulations and orders as may be lawfully made under its provisions. Any railroad company herein referred to, or its officers or employees, violating any provision of this section, or any of the orders or regulations made by the Commissioners by authority of the same, or permitting such violation, shall be punished, in the case of a railroad company by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, and in the case of an officer or employee of a railroad company by a fine not exceeding $100, or imprisonment not exceeding thirty days, or by both such fine and imprisonment. And each day of failure or neglect on the part of any railroad company, its officers or employees, to obey each and all of the provisions and requirements of this section, or the orders and regulations of the Commissioners issued thereunder, shall be regarded as a separate offense. Prosecutions under this section shall be in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, upon which jurisdiction is hereby conferred to try and determine the same. Such prosecutions shall be conducted by the corporation counsel or his assistant, who shall be entitled to a fee of not to exceed $25, to be fixed by the court, which fee shall be taxed as costs against the party failing in the suit.

[The time of Mr. HEPBURN having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I believe that with a provision of that kind in the law the people of this District can have good service. I would vote for all the other provisions if we had that. I regard it as the most important of all, because that will secure efficient service. If these gentlemen, who are responsible for the wrongs and outrages perpetrated upon a helpless populace, felt that they might look through the bars of a prison they would be more mindful of their duties. As long as a mere fine is the limitation of the power of the court, they may be quite careless, because the corporation will pay their fine and put another and an additional burden upon the people, for they in the end will have to pay all the fines that are levied upon public-service corporations. But if there is danger of imprisonment, and if it might be the truth that their handsome faces could be seen through the network of bars, by which security is given to prisoners, they might look upon the matter differently. [Loud applause]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I think general debate is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. If no other Member desires to take the floor, the Clerk will read. The Chair will suggest that there is a substitute offered by the committee, which is one amendment. Does the gentleman desire to have it read through before any amendments are offered, or have it read section by section?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think it would be more satisfactory to have it read section by section.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendments will be offered section by section, as though it were an original proposition.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Washington Railway and Electric Company be, and it is hereby, authorized and required to construct and extend, by double tracks, the lines of its underground electric railroad from North Capitol and C streets northwardly along North Capitol street and the new street running northeast from North Capitol and D streets to the Union Station plaza; thence westwardly in said plaza and near to the southern curb thereof to Massachusetts avenue, there to connect with the tracks of the City and Suburban Railway of Washington, hereinbefore authorized, and with the two tracks provided for in section 8 of this act; also a double-track extension of its lines from First and B streets NE. northwardly on First street to the Union Station plaza; thence eastwardly in said plaza and near to the southern curb thereof to connect with the tracks of the City and Suburban Railway, hereinbefore authorized, and with the two tracks provided for in section 8 of this act.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan if it is not practicable to secure all of the facilities that are now needed in reaching the new station by roads that would run from C street and North Capitol street in front of the building, and then reach B street at its intersection with First street? A single double-track road of that description would give all of the present needed facilities, would it not?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to clearly understand the gentleman.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will have a map here in a moment to show what I mean. I ask that this section may be passed for the moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that section 2 may be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Capital Traction Company of the District of Columbia be, and it is hereby, authorized and required to construct and extend, by double tracks, the lines of its underground electric railroad from Florida avenue and Seventh street NW. southeastwardly along Florida avenue to its intersection with Eighth street east, thence southwardly along Eighth street to Pennsylvania avenue, there to connect with existing tracks of the Capital Traction Company; also a double-track extension from the tracks hereinbefore authorized on Florida avenue southeastwardly along New Jersey avenue to its intersection with Massachusetts avenue and First street west, thence along said Massachusetts avenue southeastwardly to the said plaza, and with such northerly deviation as may be necessary to bring the tracks immediately in front of and adjacent to the main entrance of the Union Station, thence by such route as may be determined by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to the corner of Second and F streets NE., thence east on F street north to Eighth street east to connect with the tracks of the Capital Traction Company hereinbefore authorized; also a double-track extension of its lines from Seventh and T streets NW. eastwardly along T street to Florida avenue to connect with the tracks of the Capital Traction Company hereinbefore authorized; also a double-track extension of its lines from North Capitol and C streets northwardly along North Capitol street and the new street running northeast from North Capitol and D streets to the Union Station plaza, thence westwardly in said plaza and near to the southern curb thereof to Massachusetts avenue to connect with the tracks of the Capital Traction Company hereinbefore authorized; also a double-track extension on North Capitol street from D street to Massachusetts avenue to connect the tracks of said company hereinbefore authorized; also a double-track extension of its tracks from First and C streets NE. northwardly on First street to the Union Station plaza, thence eastwardly in said plaza and near to the southern curb thereof to connect with the tracks of the Capital Traction Company hereinbefore authorized, and with the two tracks provided for in section 8 of this act.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, this was the section I had in my mind instead of section 2, and I ask unanimous consent that this section may be passed for the time being.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks that section 3 be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire to have section 2 considered now?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think we might consider it now.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no amendment to be offered to section 2, it will be considered as agreed to. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and the Clerk will continue the reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company be, and it is hereby, authorized and required to construct and extend by double tracks the lines of its underground electric railroad from the intersection of Second and E streets SE. northwardly along Third street to East Capitol street, there to connect with existing tracks of the Washington Railway and Electric Company.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, on page 11, line 2, I move that the word "Second" be stricken out and the word "Third" be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 11, line 2, strike out the word "Second" and insert the word "Third."

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LONGWORTH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. LATTA, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On February 15, 1908:

H. R. 14766. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

On February 20, 1908:

H. R. 2756. An act for the relief of L. K. Scott;

H. R. 13430. An act to authorize the Chicago, Indianapolis and Louisville Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Grand Calumet River in the city of Hammond, Ind.;

H. R. 14040. An act to authorize the county of Ashley, State of Arkansas, to construct a bridge across Bayou Bartholomew, at a point above Morrell, in said county and State, the dividing line between Drew and Ashley counties;

H. R. 14781. An act to authorize Campbell County, Tenn., to construct a bridge across Powells River; and

H. R. 16050. An act to authorize the Interstate Transfer Railway Company to construct a bridge across the St. Louis River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota.

EXTENSION OF STREET RAILWAY LINES TO THE UNION STATION.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That where the route or routes provided for in this act coincide with each other or with the route or routes of existing street railways or street railways hereafter authorized to be operated or constructed, one set of double tracks only shall be constructed and shall be used in common, upon terms mutually agreed upon, or, in case of disagreement, upon terms determined by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which is authorized and directed to give notice and hearings to the interested parties and to fix and finally determine the terms of the joint trackage: Provided, That there shall be only one set of double tracks immediately in front of the main entrance to the Union Station, facing Massachusetts avenue, the most northerly rail being not less than 70 feet from the axis of the south portico of said station.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of getting some information from the chairman of the committee in regard to an amendment to this section that seems to me ought to be adopted. I do not offer the amendment now because, in the first place, I have not had time to prepare it as I think it ought to be prepared, and in the next place it may be that after I have heard further from the chairman I will not desire to offer it.

My proposition, Mr. Chairman, is that we are providing in this section for the settlement of disputes that may occur between these different railroad companies by submitting it to a sort of arbitration. The arbitrators are the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia. The language is "the supreme court of the District of Columbia."

Now, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that we ought not to impose on the court this duty; that is out of the ordinary judicial procedure. It ought to be submitted, in the first instance, to some other board, and I suggest whether it would not be better to strike out the words "supreme court" and insert "Commissioners," and then allow an appeal from their decision to the supreme court, where it could be tried as all other lawsuits are tried. If we leave it as it is now, I submit to the chairman that either one or the other of these parties to the controversy will be practically without a remedy and without any means of appealing or getting into court for the purpose of giving them a judicial trial of the matter in dispute—something that all people and corporations ought to have under the law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I can say that section 8 is in accordance with the practice that has been invoked for a good while, and there has been no trouble in leaving these matters to the supreme court.

Mr. NORRIS. There are other places in this bill where the District Commissioners are given authority to settle disputes. Why is it in this particular controversy that you submit it to the supreme court?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We are simply following precedents in this matter.

Mr. NORRIS. Would the gentleman see any objection to an amendment that strikes out, in line 18, the words "supreme court" and insert the words "District Commissioners," and then make the other necessary amendment to give it effect?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This has been the precedent for some time and no harm or injury has come from it. Nobody has complained of it so far.

Mr. NORRIS. It may be that no difficulty will come in the future, but I submit to the gentleman that it practically takes away from these parties the right to go into court and settle their differences in case they feel aggrieved on account of the decision of the arbitrators.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We have had the railroad companies before the committee and they have never raised any objection to having this adjusted by the supreme court.

Mr. NORRIS. Is not this procedure out of the ordinary? We do not in passing laws here ordinarily call in the courts, but we let parties get into court in the regular way.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Last year in Congress we let the supreme court name the school board for us.

Mr. NORRIS. I know we did; and I thought then, and have thought since, that we were unwise in doing it; that we ought to keep the court on the bench to try judicial proceedings in a judicial way, and not make of them arbitrators and clerks and various other things.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I confess if I had learned there had been any difficulty in the past by this precedent, I would consent to the amendment, but otherwise I do not feel like consenting to it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, without making any further argument, I will move to amend section 8 by striking out the words "supreme court" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "Commissioners."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 18, strike out "supreme court" and insert "Commissioners," so that it will read "by the Commissioners of the District."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is adopted, it will be necessary to change one or two other words slightly, and then I want also to offer an amendment further along which will provide for an appeal.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with what the gentleman has just said in reference to this amendment. I think it would be a very unwise change of existing law. There is no necessity for having a lawsuit about where these tracks shall run. We don't want in the District of Columbia more than two tracks on any one street, but in certain places we want to go over street car lines—the opportunity to run to the main points of interest, particularly the Union Station. We must provide that the railroad that has got the tracks down shall let another railroad run over its lines. Now, this provision in the bill as it stands is very simple. It says that that shall be done; that you shall not put more than two tracks on any street, which is proper. It says that the railroad that has got the track down shall let another competing line run over it in certain places, on such terms as they shall agree to—such trackage terms as they shall mutually agree to—but if they will not agree, if the company that has the line running wants to be the dog in the manger and keep the other fellow out, why that then an arbitrator shall be appointed. Now, it is in the interest of the public that such a question should not get into the courts and be tied up year after year to determine how and on what terms one railroad can run over the track of the other. There is no great question involved. The only question that can be involved in the case at all is the question as to what is the fair compensation for the new road going in to pay the old road for running over its lines. It is not a question that is necessary to litigate about. The law fixes what shall be done—that is, that the old line shall let the new line run over its tracks, and the only question is what compensation shall be paid. All we want is an arbitrator to determine that question if the roads can not determine it for themselves. It is for the interests of the people of the District that it should be determined speedily, and not after a long drawn out lawsuit, and I do not know any arbitrators that we can select who will stand in a more disinterested place, are more beyond the usual influence that these railroad companies can bring to bear in such matters, than the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia. I think the bill should remain as it is for that reason.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not finding fault, as one might suppose after listening to the argument of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], with the law itself, with the point involved, but only to the extent that we ought not to make arbitrators of our judges of the supreme court to settle the differences that may arise between individuals or between corporations.

The gentleman's argument is based to a great extent upon a road coming in after another has been built. This particular case we have before us is a case where both roads are coming in at the same time as provided in this bill. Now, it is right that there should be some arbitrator to settle this difficulty if the roads can not settle it themselves, but it is not logical, it is not proper, but, on the other hand, in my judgment, it is absolutely wrong to say that we should make of our judges of the supreme court arbitrators to settle this particular difference. The gentleman says they are beyond the influences, as much as anybody could be, of political, railroad, or corporate domination. Admitting that, we do not want our judges to be used in that way. If we are going to make our judges upon the supreme bench arbitrators to settle every dispute that may arise between individuals and corporations, we will soon take away all dignity and all respect that the people generally have for the courts. If we are going to make them arbitrators to settle this difficulty, then it will be just as reasonable to say that they should settle every other class of legislation, and therefore, as a matter of fact, would be deprived from sitting as judges to try anything at any time or in any place in a judicial and logical way, as is contemplated and understood that all cases should be tried when they get into court.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is it not purely a judicial function now that is conferred upon the supreme court in this section to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. NORRIS. Now, I am not going to argue whether it is judicial or otherwise. I think it has some other attributes than of a judicial function in it, and some of executive, perhaps.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If that be true, will the gentleman permit another question——

Mr. NORRIS. But, for argument's sake, admit that, even if that be true, it is the principle of the thing that I object to—that we ought not to take our courts and our judges and make arbitrators of them, and thus deprive them of the right and take away from them their judicial duties of hearing lawsuits and disputes in a legal way and in the way that is contemplated judges should hear and settle legal controversies.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Well, this in the last analysis must be based upon some judicial determination, and is it not better to provide here that it shall get in court at as early a date as possible without any intervening machinery, because in the last analysis it takes a judicial determination to settle it?

Mr. NORRIS. Even though you are going to say the findings of these arbitrators should be final and there should be no appeal from them, which is practically what you have in the bill, because you can not go into court, as you disqualify the judges from sitting on a case by selecting them as arbitrators; but even if that be the intent, it would be much better to let that decision be made by some one other than the judges. We ought not to use our judges for anything else except to hold court in a judicial way. They ought not to be permitted to be used in any other way. You lower the dignity of the court; you take away from it eventually the respect that all people ought to have for it.

Mr. SIMS. Is not this really a controversy between parties? Is not this a plan to let them go——

Mr. NORRIS. There never was a difficulty except a controversy between parties.

Mr. SIMS. And it takes a judicial determination to decide it.

Mr. NORRIS. If this is the gentleman's idea, why not do away with all other laws and let them provide how a man shall go into court, so we would have a system with the court acting as arbitrators?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska will not prevail. It seems to me that the language of the bill indicates clearly that this proceeding before the court is purely a judicial proceeding. It says:

> In case of disagreement, upon terms determined by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which is authorized and directed to give notice and hearings to the interested parties and to fix and finally determine the terms of the joint trackage.

It seems to me that under the provision suggested by the gentleman from Nebraska he would simply complicate matters. First, he would have a board of arbitration pass upon this matter, and generally there is considerable wrangling before a board of arbitrators can be agreed on. And then, after that board of arbitration have determined the matter and have filed their findings, if those findings are not satisfactory to the parties in interest, as a last resort those parties in interest shall go into court. Now, the provisions of the bill require that they shall go into court at once if they can not agree, and I submit that that is the fairest, the quickest, and the best method of arriving at the result.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I take it, therefore, from what the gentleman says that he would favor a law that would do away with the practice of law in the courts and compel everybody to submit their differences in the same way that we are going to compel these people to submit their differences?

Mr. KAHN. That is hardly a fair statement of the matter. However, in most of the States of the Union the laws provide that the parties in interest may go before a board of arbitrators, if they so elect.

Mr. NORRIS. Can the gentleman name one State where they make the judges of the courts those arbitrators?

Mr. KAHN. I can not.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not believe anybody else can.

Mr. KAHN. I will say for the benefit of the gentleman that it seems to be the custom here in the District of Columbia to confer extrajudicial duties upon the judges of the supreme court of the District. But I say to the gentleman that, in my judgment, when you come to analyze the language of the section that you are simply imposing upon the judges, under the provisions of this section, a purely judicial function.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore a message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution and bill of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 138. Joint resolution to continue in full force and effect an act entitled "An act to provide for the appropriate marking of the graves of the soldiers and sailors of the Confederate army and navy who died in the northern prisons and were buried near the prisons where they died, and for other purposes.

H. R. 12401. An act to legalize a bridge across the Mississippi River at Rice, Minn.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 20.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to cause such survey and examination to be made of the existing canal and locks at the Falls of the Willamette River at Oregon City, Oreg., as may be necessary to ascertain what sum of money, at present prices, of labor and material, should be appropriated by Congress in addition to the appropriation already made by the State of Oregon therefor, to enable the Government to acquire said canal and locks and properly repair the same.

Senate concurrent resolution 35.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring) That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to submit an estimate to Congress as to the cost of improvements and works necessary to restore the Missouri River to its proper channel at the city of Atchison, in the State of Kansas.

Senate concurrent resolution 37.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a survey to be made of Providence River and Harbor between Kettle Point, Rhode Island, and Gaspee Point, Rhode Island, with a view to widening and straightening the channel and dredging the same to a depth of 25 feet at mean low water, and to submit a plan and estimate for such improvements.

EXTENSION OF STREET RAILWAY LINES TO THE UNION STATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I gave notice this morning that I would offer an amendment in the form of a new section at the end of section 6, on page 12. I ask unanimous consent that we may return to that section in order that I may offer the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] asks unanimous consent to return to the end of section 6 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding on page 12 at end of line 24, as a new section, the following:

"SEC. 6. That all companies or corporations which now are or shall hereafter be engaged in the operation of street cars within the District of Columbia shall have equal rights and privileges in relation to the passage of street cars over the tracks herein authorized and directed to be constructed, upon payment of reasonable compensation for such use. In case of any disagreement between companies or corporations concerning the terms of such use or the sums to be paid therefor all matters at issue shall be determined by the supreme court of the District of Columbia. In determining what is a reasonable compensation for the use of such tracks no account shall be taken of the value of the franchise of any company or corporation involved in the determination, but such compensation shall be based solely upon the actual value of the physical property used and the reasonable cost of its maintenance."

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, naturally the streets belong to the public; and if any street shall be given to a particular railroad for use, it amounts to a monopoly unless other companies may be permitted to lay parallel tracks along the same street or to use the tracks already laid. Everybody who is familiar with the streets of this or any other city knows that it is wholly impracticable and out of the question to lay more than a double track in any street. Therefore, to prevent a street falling into the hands of any particular company, and to be used by it as a monopoly, I have offered the amendment which has been read.

We find a parallel for this in the franchises that are given to railroads to build bridges across navigable streams. For instance, it would be wholly impracticable to let every railroad that desires to enter a given city erect a separate bridge in order to get to that city. A multiplicity of bridges would be an impediment to navigation. Congress has universally, in granting these bridge charters, provided that all railroads desiring to use such bridges shall have equal rights and privileges in the use thereof. So I think it should be with reference to these streets.

Privileges can not be granted to a number of railroads to lay tracks upon a given street, and the only way remaining to prevent the granting of an absolute monopoly to the company that first gets the privilege of using a particular street is to provide that when a track is laid upon that street all street car companies desiring to use that track shall have equal rights and privileges in the use of it, paying therefor a reasonable compensation. And that compensation, I think, and as I have required in the amendment which I have drawn, should be based upon the value of the physical property and the necessary expense in maintaining it, and a reasonable return upon the amount of money actually invested. The tracks that are being allowed here to-day amount, in fact, to a belt line around the Union Station. The traction companies we now have may not choose to build all the lines the people of this city need. No other company can build to that station unless it shall use these tracks we are now authorizing. The streets belong to the public. They should forever belong to the public and be used for the benefit of the public, and they can not be so used if these companies named in this bill shall secure a monopoly of them.

The tracks should be treated precisely as a terminal station. They should belong not to the railroads, but to the people, to be used by the people, to be used by every company that chooses to serve the people. Otherwise we shall have a most hurtful monopoly in this as we have in many other cities. It would be no hardship upon one of the companies putting down these tracks. They are, under my amendment, to receive from another company using them a reasonable compensation, based upon the value of their property and the cost of its maintenance.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is not the converse of that proposition also true; for under your amendment would not a company that had a couple of cars and a block of street railway then get the privilege of using all of the trackage within the city?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It is hardly so broad as that, but admitting for the sake of argument that it is, would they not have to pay for it a reasonable return if they used the tracks; a reasonable return for the money invested in them? And they are not entitled to more than a reasonable return.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Would that include pay for the passengers they had picked up on all the route of the railroad?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. There is the point I make. The gentleman has brought that point out. What I contend is that they should have a reasonable compensation upon the amount of money they had invested for the tracks and the amount of money that is required to keep those tracks in repair and a reasonable interest or rent or income, as you choose to call it, on the money invested. Everything else is something they do not own, something that the people own. Do you want these companies to collect dividends on the franchises which we give them for nothing?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I ask that I may have five minutes more.

Mr. CARLIN. I dislike very much to object to extending the time of the gentleman, but there are other sections here that we want to consider, and the gentleman should have been here when this section was under consideration.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Oh, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CARLIN. Other gentlemen want to have an opportunity to be heard on other sections.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. CARLIN. I withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Now, Mr. Chairman, the point I was making has been clearly placed before this House by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], to wit, that these companies shall have in the future the right, as they have done in the past from time immemorial, to collect an income upon the amount of money they have invested, collect an income on the amount of money that they shall annually expend in keeping up their property, and collect in addition an income on the franchise that is given to them for nothing by act of Congress.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will you yield to me?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I have hardly time; I would if I had more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Now, what I want is, that we shall grant no monopoly of streets. The company may have a monopoly in the money that it has invested; it may have a monopoly in the money it expends in keeping up its property, and it is entitled to an adequate income upon that investment; but this intangible, invisible thing, called a "franchise," that is given to it as a munificent bonus by Congress, is not to be put up as a barrier between the people and the better and cheaper facilities of transportation that they demand.

I ask unanimous consent that I may have permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I approve of every word the gentleman from Missouri has stated. I want to say that when this matter was first suggested to the committee I heartily favored it. I had an idea at that time that we could make it binding, but upon inquiry I find there is no general law permitting railways outside of the District to enter the District of Columbia; consequently street railways, or any other kind of railroad, that comes into the District of Columbia must come in by special act of Congress. And that special act provides how it shall get in, and what tracks, if any, it shall use, and the terms upon which it may do so. If we had a general law of this kind we could not bind any future Congress, and any Congress following, or this one, could hereafter authorize any company to come in, and come to this Union Station upon such terms as might be fixed, thereby, in effect, repealing the provisions of any general law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is it not a fact that there is a street railway company which has built an electric railroad between Baltimore and Washington which has come to the edge of the city limits and can not get into town?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know about that. I do not know whether that is so or not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And would it not have the privilege of coming in under this amendment?

Mr. SIMS. There has been no bill before our committee authorizing it, and they will have to have a bill in order to do it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Did not that company get a charter at the last session of Congress?

Mr. SIMS. Not that I know of.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Would not that company be authorized, upon reaching the city limits, to come in by paying a price to be agreed upon, or in the event of a failure to agree, to be fixed by the court?

Mr. SIMS. I should not think so, because every railway corporation operating in the District of Columbia does so by authority of a special act of Congress, and if it takes a special act, then that act can make any provision which Congress sees proper.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Would it not be well in granting this franchise now to reserve this, which they may say we have not the power to take away from them afterwards?

Mr. SIMS. We do reserve the right to alter, amend, or repeal.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That does not reach the point.

Mr. SIMS. I have no objection to the objects and purposes of the amendment, but it seems to me it will be futile, for other corporations can not operate in the District of Columbia without a special act of Congress, because the special act will fix the terms upon which the corporation may operate in the District of Columbia, in spite of any general law we pass now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thought the provision of the gentleman from Missouri was a general law. I should like to hear that amendment read.

Mr. SIMS. It is a general law.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It would bind all the companies now operating railroads in the District of Columbia and in effect would be a general law.

Mr. SIMS. It is a general law so far as existing lines are concerned.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Limiting the franchise that we are now granting.

Mr. SIMS. But no road can get in without a Congressional franchise, and in enacting that franchise Congress can impose such conditions as it may see fit, which will in effect be a repeal of the general law.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. One other question, please. Can another Congress give to another company that which we now give away to this?

Mr. SIMS. This is a mere privilege. We do not give them anything, only the right to do what they themselves are doing, not the right to keep somebody else from doing it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. They will argue that it does; and why give them the opportunity to make the argument?

Mr. SIMS. We have already an act providing for the use of tracks, upon making proper compensation. In this very bill we authorize the use of tracks by different companies, upon such compensation as shall be agreed upon, or, in case of disagreement, to be fixed by the court. I am not opposed to the gentleman's provision. The trouble is, I do not believe it will ever apply, because every new company coming in will have to come in by virtue of an act of Congress, and that act will make the terms upon which it shall come in, in spite of any law we may pass now. I have no objection to it, but it seems to me we can not bind future Congresses.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has stated the objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD]. The whole matter has been gone over thoroughly. This amendment is not new to the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia. We took the position in the committee that I take here, and that the gentleman from Tennessee has taken here. We have reserved in this bill, as is done in all franchise bills, the right to alter, amend, or repeal the law granting any privileges in the District of Columbia. My opposition to this amendment is that it would enact a general law here, giving any street railway company, or any trolley company applying for the privilege, the right to use the lines of any or all the street railways here in the District. The amendment does not confine its privileges to those already in existence, but refers also to those that may hereafter be built, Inasmuch as any street railway company that comes into the District of Columbia hereafter must come in as the result of an easement given over the streets of the city by act of Congress, we can provide for them in the light of the claims that are made by that particular company. Under the provisions of this amendment a suburban line a mile in length, or less, and with three or four cars, could have full use of all the tracks now built on the streets in this city, and could pick up passengers and get the revenues that rightfully belong to the companies that have built these street railways and which are more entitled to their use, I submit, than any company that builds a mile or two outside of the city and has but a few cars.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] well stated early in this debate this afternoon that a street railway has a natural monopoly on the street. One line of street railway upon a single street is a monopoly, but we have provided in section 8 of this bill that no one company shall have a monopoly in the use of the tracks approaching the Union Station. We have reserved the right to exercise the control which Congress always reserves in granting these franchises; we say that all companies to which we refer in this bill shall have the right to use all the tracks going to Union Station, and I have no doubt that any company that comes into the District of Columbia in the future by authority of Congress will have the same rights that we give to the companies that are here now under the provisions of this bill.

I object to the amendment because of its sweeping character and because we have a right at all times to give any company, when such a company makes application to come into the District of Columbia or into the Union Station, such privileges as under the other conditions it is entitled to. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri may not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD].

The question was considered, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to return to section 3.

Mr. HEPBURN. I withdraw my request, Mr. Chairman, to return to section 3.

The CHAIRMAN. At the request of the gentleman from Iowa the committee passed section 3 without prejudice. The gentleman from Iowa now states that he does not desire to return to it. Without objection, section 3 will be considered as agreed to. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That existing transfer arrangements between the Washington Railway and Electric Company and the Metropolitan Coach Company, a corporation of the District of Columbia, shall not be terminated, except by authority of Congress; and unless said Metropolitan Coach Company shall, within one year after the passage of this act, substitute motor vehicles to be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the herdics now used by it, its right to operate its line shall cease and determine: Provided further, That all transfers issued by the Metropolitan Coach Company shall be properly dated and punched as to time limit as provided by rules and regulations to be made, altered, and amended from time to time by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and that unless said transfers are so dated and punched the Washington Railway and Electric Company shall not be required to receive them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, at the end of line 5, page 17, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of line 5, page 17, the words "Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be held to give the said Metropolitan Coach Company any franchise to use any of the streets and avenues in the District of Columbia."

Mr. SIMS. What is the object of that? It was not considered by the committee?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. A question has arisen that possibly under that section the herdic company may gain franchise rights in Sixteenth street, and therefore I offer the proviso.

Mr. SIMS. It looks to me like a case of imagination; there is nothing in the law indicating anything of that sort.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to have the amendment voted down.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am doing this at the suggestion of the corporation counsel of the District, so as to save any possible question in the future about the rights of the herdic company. It can do no harm and I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will let the proviso go in to save any question.

Mr. SIMS. I have not studied it. This bill has had a long, hard struggle to exist because of the lack of statutory requirement to make transfers. Now, if they fail to put in the electric herdics or cabs within twelve months, it shall cease. They have got to provide capital with which to do that; to make a mandatory provision for transfers, coupled with the provision that they must put on the equipment provided in the act, will enable them to get the capital to do this. This service is desirable. We do not want to have any more street cars in the District of Columbia than we can help, and then to say that it gives them no franchise looks like something of a shadow or something that might injure their ability to secure money with which to comply with the terms of the act.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It was the opinion of the corporation counsel that possibly at some future time, by reason of this section, the herdic company might claim they had some franchise rights in Sixteenth street.

Mr. SIMS. I can not for the life of me see how they can gain rights they have not got.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Under the terms of the bill if any franchise rights are given we have a right to repeal them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is true.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It does not seem to me the gentleman accomplishes anything by putting this proviso in, except to limit the opportunity of this motor company to compete with the street car company. You limit the opportunity of issuing the bonds or raising capital by reflecting on the company in this bill, and thereby may prevent them from inaugurating a motor line which will be a competitor of the street car companies and undoubtedly of great benefit to the residents of the District.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, I am not very strenuous about it.

Mr. DRISCOLL. All the gentlemen seem to agree that this herdic company or other company could obtain no franchise. Now, the provision is offered by the chairman of the committee putting that in writing, so that there will be no doubt about it. If it is voted down, won't it be fair to assume that some of the gentlemen on the floor of the House think that this company will obtain a franchise by user or prescription or in some way?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say this——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask to be recognized. I think unquestionably we are giving under this bill to this company a franchise right, not to build a street-car line, but a franchise right to run a motor car on Sixteenth street, and I think it is wise to give it that right. To the people who live out Sixteenth street that line has been of great service. If they put on motor cars instead of horses and wagons it will be of greater service.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I understood from the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] that they assume that the company would not be given any franchise rights.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman reads the bill he will clearly see that they are given the franchise rights to run a motor car. Why should we reflect on that franchise in this way, when it may be of value to them in obtaining money to buy their motor cars?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I will ask to have this amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman will see that this is an absolute limitation. Here you have a herdic company. We want them to put motor cars on instead of herdics. They have that right. You do not say in that amendment that they do not have any franchise as a street car company, but you say they shall have no franchise at all. The sections of the bill propose to give them a franchise—the right to run a motor car on Sixteenth street.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Can't they run their motor cars without any franchise?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I don't know whether they can or not. They probably have to have a permit.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is there not danger that they will assume that they have some sort of a franchise greater than the ordinary man has who drives a motor car or a team of horses?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it not true that all they have now is a license or a permit? They have no franchise.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If they claim more than Congress wants to give them, Congress can repeal it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I can not understand how it would do any harm to put this in, it would save any harm in the future.

Mr. SHERLEY. Would it not be wise to add to the amendment offered by the gentleman the words "not now possessed?" In other words, they have certain privileges now, and the effect of the amendment would be to bring into doubt the rights they now possess, whereas if you add to it that this shall give them no additional rights, then you safeguard without impairing what they ought to have and now properly have.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion there? Just in addition to what the gentleman from Kentucky has said, I want to say it seems to me now they have absolutely no franchise——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly not.

Mr. NORRIS. And if you strike out section 13 of the bill, they would not have a franchise, but if you leave it in you give them one, for the simple reason that you say in that section that the present arrangement shall not cease except upon permission of Congress. If that has any legal effect, and I doubt it greatly, it means what it says, of course.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That the transfer arrangement shall not cease. They have now a permit.

Mr. NORRIS. That the arrangement they now have with the electric-car company shall not cease without consent having been given by Congress. Now, you say in one breath they shall go on and do so and so and in the next breath you say they shall not have any franchise.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be recognized in my own right. I want to say this, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this amendment offered by the chairman is not a committee amendment. It has never been considered in the committee at all, and it is sprung on us so suddenly we have not had time to consider it, and I think it ought to be voted down. I do not think a cloud should be thrown on this herdic service; we simply give them the power to substitute a different vehicle from the one they have and provide that transfers shall cease unless they make the substitution.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield? Is it not a fact that the gentleman's amendment absolutely makes it impossible for the motor company to make any arrangement whatever for transfers with the street car companies?

Mr. SIMS. That is exactly what I say, and I desire——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Therefore it compels a passenger desiring to go on the motor company to pay two fares, when we are now trying to reduce them to one. I think the amendment is a bad one.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan, and that is to add the words "not now possessed" at the end of said amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the words to the amendment "not now possessed," so as to read "any of the streets and avenues in the District of Columbia not now possessed."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire also, with the permission of the committee, to add the words "and hereby given."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Add also the words "and hereby given."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the motion made by the gentleman from Kentucky is one degree too remote, since this bill itself is an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is mistaken——

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman will recall the committee agreed by uanimous consent that this bill should have the same parliamentary status as a bill originally reported.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not understand we made that agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That the Washington Railway and Electric Company and the Capital Traction Company be, and they are hereby, authorized and required, jointly, to construct, maintain, and operate, by overhead trolley, temporary railway tracks for passenger service from the Union Station to the intersection of either North Capitol street or Delaware avenue and C street north, as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may direct, said tracks to be constructed within sixty days from the date of the approval of this act in accordance with plans approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, said tracks to be maintained and operated by said companies to the satisfaction of said Commissioners, and to be removed by said companies after the construction of the permanent street railway tracks herein provided for within thirty days after notice from said Commissioners so to do.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to the language used in lines 18 and 20, commencing after the word "companies" in line 18, page 17, section 14, and ending with the word "for" in line 20. The thought has been suggested to me that although the bill provides that the road must be completed within twelve months, that the Commissioners may have the power to extend the time for the completion of the permanent work six months longer, that if the companies should not wish to build the permanent work at all, that the Commissioners would not have power under the wording of this section to order the removal of the temporary tracks, because this language, commencing in line 18, says:

After the construction of the permanent railway tracks herein provided for within thirty days after notice from said Commissioners so to do.

If the section were allowed to read "and to be removed by said companies within thirty days after notice from said Commissioners so to do," without the other language being in the section, it would be within the power then of the Commissioners to order the removal if the permanent structure was not completed at all by the company.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That seems to be a wise proposition. Why does not the gentleman make a motion to that effect?

Mr. MADDEN. I am going to, but I wanted to explain, so that the committee would understand the purpose of it. Now, I move to strike out the words in line 18, commencing after the word "companies," down to and including the word "for" in line 20.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 18, after the word "companies,' strike out the words "after the construction of the permanent street railway tracks herein provided for."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, we accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That all street railway companies or lessees now operating or controlling, or hereafter operating or controlling, their systems or part of their systems in the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and required, and shall, in said District, make or cause to be made and given, at all times, free, reciprocal, continuous, universal transfers, interchangeable to, from, and over the line or lines of every other street railway company or companies in said District, good and receivable at all junction points, intersections, or connections of every said street railway company with the line or lines of every other said street railway company, for one continuous passage in one general direction for one cash or ticket fare. All said street railway companies are authorized and required to receive, accept, and honor all transfers made or given in accordance herewith, and to carry all passengers transferred without the payment of additional fare: Provided, That all said street railway companies shall sell six tickets for 25 cents.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment pending to that paragraph which I desire to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 18, line 22, by striking out the word "six" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "eight."

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, just a word. It has been stated by some of the gentlemen who were discussing this question to-day—the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]—that some of these railroads are paying a dividend on a capitalization of $650,000 to the mile. It has also been stated on this floor by gentlemen who are competent to pass judgment upon such matters that $100,000 per mile would be an extravagant sum for building and equipping these railroads. In other words, Mr. Chairman, it has been shown that we are paying a 6 per cent dividend to these railroads on six and one-half times the amount of capital required for building and equipping them. We are to-day in the midst of a panic brought on very largely by corporations watering their stock and floating that water out to absorb the money of the country. There is no better place on earth to commence the correction of overcapitalization than right here now. If a 5-cent fare pays a 6 per cent dividend on six and one-half times the actual value of the property engaged, this amendment will still furnish ample funds to pay a fair, honest dividend upon the real value of the property of these railroad companies. How much longer must the American public pay for the water that is fraudulently put into the stocks of the corporations?

Mr. Chairman, this is the capital of the Republic. We as the Congress of the United States ought to stand here as models of what legislators should do in behalf of the people. We ought not to wink at overcapitalization. We ought not to tolerate overcapitalization. Every man upon this floor knows that $650,000 per mile is overcapitalization. Every man upon this floor knows that in paying dividends upon $650,000 a mile these railroads are compelling the people to pay dividends upon water that has been forced into the capitalization of these roads. It is not worth while to wait until we go home and get upon the stump and talk about overcapitalization. It is up to every gentleman upon this floor to show his faith by his works. Vote as you talk! Here is a chance to say by your vote that you are opposed to overcapitalization. Do not wait until you get home among the glorious constituency that you represent.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I would like to ask the gentleman how many members of the Committee on the District of Columbia who examined this matter are in favor of this amendment?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman will excuse me from betraying the secrets of executive sessions of my committee. The rules do not allow it.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I would like to know if any of them really believed that the company could afford to do this.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, if a company is paying 6 per cent on $650,000 a mile, and probably not worth more than $100,000, on a 5-cent fare, can not it pay a fair dividend on the real value on a 3-cent fare? What Tom Johnson has done can not we do?

Mr. DRISCOLL. What are their running expenses?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Their running expenses are about 50 per cent of the gross income, and the other 50 per cent pays 6 per cent on $650,000 a mile, which is more than six and a half times its value. Now, that is all I have to say.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman what provision is there for limiting the issuance of bonds for the extension of these railroad lines as provided, as I understand they are compelled by the letter of this proposed enactment.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I am not informed just what the provisions are; but it does not make any difference on this question of the universal transfer and 3-cents fare.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Am I to understand that there is no provision limiting the amount of bonds and obligations that they may issue?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. There is no provision to limit their bonds or stocks. That is one of the things that I have been trying to remedy. I have been trying to get a bill out of my committee authorizing the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to assess the value of the physical property of these roads, but I have not been able to do it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that I was not able to get the information that I really wanted, as to what provision it was proposed to make in this law for the issuance of securities against the roads that the letter of this proposed act compels the companies to construct, because, as I understand it, we can not now legislate in such a way as to compel a reduction of the capitalization on lines already in existence and where the securities have been issued. But we can control future issues, and reasonably do so. We can with propriety say what shall be the revenue collected upon the mileage to be constructed.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether these roads can afford to carry passengers for 3 cents. I have not heard of any demand for 3-cent fare. I am much more interested in securing adequate transportation for what we do pay, and I believe that the public is. It rarely happens that a Member of Congress going home after a day's session can get a seat in a car. They are crowded to an unusual degree of discomfort. I would like primarily to see better accommodation for the traveling public; to have more cars, and for the passengers to have an opportunity now and then, at least, to get a seat. Then I belong to that rather numerous class that enjoys a cigar in the morning, and when I start to the Capitol I would like to have a seat in a car dedicated to the use of smokers. [Laughter.]

I wish for better accommodation for the fare we are now paying, 4 cents, which I do not believe excessive. Before undertaking to compel any further reduction, I first want to see the public accommodated. There is no complaint as to the amount charged, but there is daily, hourly, complaint about the accommodation. I had an experience a few days ago in company with one of my colleagues, Mr. REID, of Arkansas. It was late; we were both anxious to get home, and very unhappily had to stand on the platform, and I could barely get a footing at that. If it had not been for the big husky character of my colleague, I believe that the motorman or conductor would have licked me for getting on the platform. [Laughter.] I want to see better facilities and better accommodation, and I believe that the people of Washington would be willing to pay a 4-cent fare for better service. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, amend section 16, in line 11, by inserting, after the word "over," the following: "its own line or lines and;" and in line 12 strike out the word "every" and insert the word "any;" in line 15, after the word "with," insert "its own line or lines and;" in line 15 strike out the word "said."

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, this amendment was sent to the desk this morning by Mr. JOHNSON, a member of the District Committee from Kentucky. The object is simple. The provision is made because without it in one or two instances these companies would not transfer to any other track on their own lines with which they came in contact. That is the sole purpose effected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 16 of the pending bill be amended as follows:
After the words "twenty-five cents," at the end of line 22, section 16, page 18, add the following:
"The provisions of this section shall apply to all railroad or railway companies which operate cars by electricity within any portion of the District of Columbia, and which enter the same from the States of Virginia or Maryland, whether they physically connect or not with the other electric railways."

Mr. CARLIN. It is not intended by that amendment to enlarge this section, but, rather, intended to make certain the construction of the act. I do not understand that there is any objection to the amendment on the part of the chairman of the committee, and for that reason I will not discuss it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the gentleman understand that it permits a person to get six tickets for a quarter, and on one of those tickets go to Alexandria?

Mr. CARLIN. No, sir; it simply permits them to get six tickets for a quarter, for the purpose of riding on any such car line within the District of Columbia, and getting their transfer at the end of the car line in the District.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Will the Clerk read that amendment again?

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to inquire of the gentleman, would not this amendment permit a person getting on a car at the Capitol to get off at Twelfth street and take a car to Mount Vernon on a transfer?

Mr. CARLIN. No; because Congress only has authority to legislate concerning this road within the District of Columbia. Under the present act of Congress this road is now compelled to do a street car service within the District of Columbia.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Take the other part of it. A person leaving Mount Vernon, arriving at the terminal of that road in this city, would be entitled to receive a transfer, and to ride to any part of the District of Columbia. While I believe that the Members of the House wish to perfect a transfer system that will permit interchange from one system of roads to another, I doubt whether any such transfer system as proposed in this amendment would effect what is in the contemplation of anybody. Now, that railroad——

Mr. CARLIN. I thought the gentleman wanted to ask me a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think I got the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. CARLIN. No, sir; I do not. I did yield for the purpose of a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. CARLIN. I judge from the gentleman's remarks that he has not read the provision to which the amendment is intended to apply.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have just heard it read.

Mr. CARLIN. You have heard the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The section has just been read, and if the gentleman was here he would know that it had been read.

Mr. CARLIN. I was here and I understand that, but I did not know the gentleman had heard it. The provision is as follows:

SEC. 16. That all street railway companies or lessees now operating or controlling, or hereafter operating or controlling, their systems or part of their systems in the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and required——

Now, the railroads to which this amendment is intended to apply do operate parts of their lines in the District of Columbia, and this provision is intended to apply to those railroads. The object of this amendment is simply to make the provision more certain.

A deeper reason is this: The railroads which come into the District of Columbia from the neighboring States, namely, Virginia and Maryland, haul passengers a shorter distance for five cents than any railroads which operate exclusively in the District. They are authorized and compelled to do a street car service, and they do a street car service within the District of Columbia, and a new union station is shortly to be constructed just north of the Long Bridge, under an act previously passed by this Congress, and all the people who come into the District of Columbia from the south must and will use that Union Station as a matter of convenience; and when they get off at that station and pay a street car fare over the Mount Vernon Railroad into the city of Washington, they will be as much entitled to transfer over the other roads as will anybody who gets on a Pennsylvania avenue car and rides to that point.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Does not the first part of this section cover the case that the gentleman is trying to bring into the bill?

Mr. CARLIN. I discussed that with the chairman of the committee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Let me read the portion I refer to. It says that any street railway company operating its lines or a part of its system in the District of Columbia shall do all these things.

Mr. CARLIN. There would not be any question that you were correct if it were not for the fact that in the act you use the words "at all junction points." That would mean a physical connection, and the only object of my amendment is to avoid the question of a physical connection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. The gentleman wants that special line between the Capital Traction and the Alexandria track known as a junction?

Mr. CARLIN. That is the effect of my amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me, it is true that this road from Mount Vernon makes no physical connection with the Pennsylvania avenue line, but it does not miss it by over 40 feet. It comes in down by the post-office, and this bill, which says that a transfer shall be had wherever there is an intersection or connection, would not, without this amendment, apply. Take the line that comes in from Maryland; it goes to the Treasury and it misses a physical connection with the car line there, the Fourteenth street car line, by about 4 feet, but it does not make the connection. There is no intersection, no connection.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman from Mississippi has very properly interpreted the effect of my amendment.

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman from Virginia will modify his amendment to show that it only applies to tickets purchased for use within the District, it will avoid the objection of the gentleman from New York. As stated, it is unfair for a man to get on at Mount Vernon and buy a ticket through and then get a transfer to go anywhere he wishes in Washington, and if this amendment does not mean that, it ought to be made to say so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why is it any more unfair than if he gets on at Georgetown?

Mr. SIMS. This is not a city company. The Mount Vernon Company runs about 18 miles and charges 75 cents or $1.

Mr. CARLIN. I did not understand the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] to object to my amendment when I showed it to him and he read it.

Mr. SIMS. I do not object to it if the proper language is used to show the gentleman's intention, and I suggest that it will obviate the objection of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. CARLIN. In answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee and also the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], I want to say that Congress has no power to regulate fares within the State of Virginia.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, yes; it is an interstate road, and we have full power.

Mr. CARLIN. Well, it may be true that the company is an interstate company, but there is no such intention as that indicated by the gentleman in my amendment. It is to meet the conditions made by the use of the word "junction" in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was considered, and on a division (demanded by Mr. CARLIN) there were—31 ayes and 46 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 18, lines 16 and 17, strike out the words "in one general direction," so that the clause will read, "for one continuous passage for one cash or ticket fare."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the attention of the chairman of the committee until I explain this amendment, because I would like to have him accept it. These words "in one general direction," as I understand, are used in the present law for the transfer by each company. Under that system if you get on the street car at the Public Printing Office and ride toward the Treasury Department and want to come back to the Capitol, that company will not give you a transfer. If you get on at the Printing Office and ride toward the Treasury and want to go to Georgetown you can get a transfer; but, as I say, if you want to come to the Capitol you have to pay two fares, because it is not in the same general direction. Now, there is no cross-town road by which you can get to the Public Printing Office, and if you do not strike out these words you will require every citizen who lives along this section of the city, when he wants to come to the Capitol or to the Navy-Yard, to pay two fares, and it will not be a general transfer.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to say to the gentleman that if we do not leave those words in there we will find plenty of people riding around in a circle.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that he is mistaken about that, and I will tell him why. We have a universal system of transfers in my town. As a matter of fact you can get on a car and ride in a circle if you want to—some of the street cars run in a circle—but I have never known of a man who gets on a street car for the fun of riding on a street car. He is usually going somewhere.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, they frequently do it here in the summer time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But there is a limitation on that. Besides that, I will call the gentleman's attention to this fact: You could not ride in a circle under this proposition. You would get to the end of the line eventually, because it is not in the same general direction. If you keep the words in the bill that are in there now, "not in the same general direction," you are going to prohibit all the people that come down on a V-shaped proposition from having a transfer. There are a great many people that live out in the neighborhood of the New York avenue line who work at the navy-yard. There is no reason on earth why you should require those people to pay two fares when you are letting other people ride on one fare. There is no cross-town connection. If you want to go from the Public Printer's Office to the Capitol and ride on a street car, the only way you can do it is to go down to Fifteenth street and come back.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But I desire to remind the gentleman that if this bill is enacted into law it will cure the defects that he spoke of. We are going to have a cross-town connection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But there are other places where this same thing occurs where there is no cross-town connection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the gentleman's proposition is accepted, a man can get on a car at Pennsylvania avenue and ride over to Georgetown and out to Chevy Chase and back down to U street and down Florida avenue to Eighth and down Eighth to where he got on. He will transfer in a circle. The object of these words was to prevent anything of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I admit that there may be some cases in which it might be abused if we strike out the words "in one general direction," but on the other hand I know that you are going to prevent a great many people from getting the benefit of the universal transfer if you leave those words in, where they come down the two sides of a V-shaped situation. Therefore I think it is better to eliminate those words. There will be very little loss on the part of the company, and you will put a great many people to a great cost in this town merely because of a few people who might, for the pleasure of it, make a continuous circuit. They have got to get off eventually. It is very seldom they will ride just for the fun of riding. I say for the benefit of these people who live along these lines we ought to strike out the words "in one general direction."

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee one question. We will suppose a man on a street car comes down Fourteenth street to the connection with the Avenue cars.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the gentleman refer to Pennsylvania avenue?

Mr. HARDY. Yes. Would not the language of this provision prevent him from taking a car over to Georgetown, because it is in an entirely different direction. At present, I understand, they give those transfers, but you come down Fourteenth street, coming in a southerly direction, and you reach the Avenue, and then you take a direction going northwest. Is that the same general direction? You are going northwest—nearly back the way you came.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think some discretion in these matters is to be allowed the conductors in determining the matter.

Mr. HARDY. Under this provision could not the railway system in Washington refuse to grant transfers from the Fourteenth street car to the Georgetown line?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They do now.

Mr. HARDY. Oh, no; they give them always.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the gentleman mean between the Capital Traction Company and the Washington Railway and Electric Company? One is owned by the Capital Traction and the other is the property of the Washington Railway and Electric Company.

Mr. HARDY. I know they always call transfers to Georgetown before they get to the Treasury building. I don't know what the system is.

We have transfers now, but they can be refused under this law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MANN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 902), the trackage bill, and had directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR BUILDING BRIDGE ACROSS RED RIVER AT SHREVEPORT, LA.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16955) to extend the time for building the bridge across Red River at Shreveport, La.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1907, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across Red River at Shreveport, La.," be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from February 3, 1908."

The amendments recommended by the committe were read, as follows:

In line 3 strike out the word "March" and insert the word "February" in lieu thereof.

In line 4 strike out the word "second" and insert the word "third" in lieu thereof.

In line 4 strike out the word "seven" and insert the word "five" in lieu thereof.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. WATKINS a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

HOUSE BILL WITH SENATE AMENDMENTS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, the bill (H. R. 586) granting an increase of pension to Squire J. Carlin, with Senate amendments, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

JOINT RESOLUTIONS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following joint resolutions:

H. J. Res. 130. Joint resolution providing for salaries of the Resident Commissioners from the Philippine Islands; and

H. J. Res. 139. Joint resolution to fill a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, the following resolutions were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

Senate concurrent resolution 29.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to cause such survey and examination to be made of the existing canal and locks at the falls of the Willamette River at Oregon City, Oreg., as may be necessary to ascertain what sum of money, at present prices of labor and material, should be appropriated by Congress in addition to the appropriation already made by the State of Oregon therefor, to enable the Government to acquire said canal and locks and properly repair the same—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Senate concurrent resolution 35.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to submit an estimate to Congress as to the cost of improvements and works necessary to restore the Missouri River to its proper channel at the city of Atchison, in the State of Kansas—

to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Senate concurrent resolution 37.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a survey to be made of Providence River and Harbor between Kettle Point, Rhode Island, and Gaspee Point, Rhode Island, with a view to widening and strengthening the channel and dredging the same to a depth of 25 feet at mean low water, and to submit a plan and estimate for such improvements—

to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

SUPERANNUATION OF CIVIL-SERVICE EMPLOYEES OF THE GOVERNMENT.

The Speaker laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying document, was referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of the Congress a report by the committee on department methods on the subject of superannuation in the classified civil service; also a draft of a proposed bill which provides for the payment of annuities to employees upon retirement.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 21, 1908.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 538), "authorizing the construction upon the military reservation at Fort Morgan, Ala., of a suitable building for use and accommodation of the customs service," and the same was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent Mr. MARSHALL was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Lucretia Williams, Fifty-ninth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 3726) to authorize the Twin City Power Company to build, operate, and maintain three dams across the Savannah River, above the city of Augusta, in the State of Georgia, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1044), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. POWERS, from the Committee on the Territories, to which was referred the resolution of the House (H. J. Res. 94) disapproving certain laws enacted by the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1045), which said resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. HAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 13077) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish four condemned brass cannon and cannon balls to the Confederate Monument Association, at Franklin, Tenn., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1046), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 14772) prescribing what shall constitute a legal cord of wood in the District of Columbia, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1047), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 16746) to authorize T. H. Friel or assigns to construct a dam across Mulberry Fork of the Warrior River, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1048), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Insular Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 17516) to increase the membership of the Philippine Commission by one member, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1049), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 4064) to provide for a term of the United States circuit and district courts at Lander, Wyo., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1050), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HENRY of Texas, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 16874) to amend section 13 of an act entitled "An act to divide the State of Texas into four judicial districts," approved March 11, 1902, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1051), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 17524) to provide for circuit and district courts of the United States at Dothan, Ala., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1052), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of bills of the following titles, which were thereupon referred as follows:

The bill (H. R. 13359) granting a pension to Gertrude A. Huth—Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. 16179) for the relief of Wilson L. Lowery—Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. MONDELL: A bill (H. R. 17700) providing for an enlarged homestead—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 17701) authorizing and empowering the Secretary of the Treasury to sell at public or private sale the property belonging to the United States formerly used as a lazaretto and quarantine warehouse at Essington, Pa.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. HEFLIN: A bill (H. R. 17702) to regulate the matter of agricultural statistics—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. WASHBURN: A bill (H. R. 17703) to repeal section 4885 of the Revised Statutes and to substitute another section therefor—to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. STURGISS: A bill (H. R. 17704) making additional annual appropriations for the more complete endowment of agricultural colleges now established, or which may hereafter be established, in accordance with the act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and for the establishment and maintenance of schools of mines and mining, and to regulate the expenditure thereof, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

By Mr. CARLIN: A bill (H. R. 17705) for the relief of pensioners of the Metropolitan police fund—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. HALE: A bill (H. R. 17706) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the middle and eastern districts of Tennessee—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri: A bill (H. R. 17707) to authorize William H. Standish to construct a dam across James River in Stone County, Mo., and divert a portion of its waters through a tunnel into the said river again to create electric power—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. GAINES of Tennessee: A bill (H. R. 17708) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the middle and eastern districts of Tennessee—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 17709) authorizing the extension of Otis place from Holmead place to Fourteenth street NW.—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. LOVERING: A bill (H. R. 17710) to increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Life-Saving Service of the United States—to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce and Labor.

By Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina: A bill (H. R. 17711) to increase the salaries of light-house keepers—to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce and Labor.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky: A bill (H. R. 17712) to increase the limit of cost of public building at Lebanon, Ky.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. SOUTHWICK: A bill (H. R. 17713) revising and amending the statute relating to trade-marks—to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. STANLEY: A bill (H. R. 17714) to prevent the improper divulging of agricultural statistics—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. SOUTHWICK: A bill (H. R. 17715) for an elastic national currency, special national bank deposit notes secured by United States bonds—to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. CARY: A bill (H. R. 17716) to amend section 1 of an act granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers and officers, who served in the civil war and the war with Mexico, passed February 6, 1907—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SAUNDERS: A bill (H. R. 17717) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents in fee to purchasers of Indian lands under any law now existing or hereafter enacted—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. RODENBERG: A bill (H. R. 17718) to acquire certain land in Hall and Elvan's subdivision of Meridian Hill, in the District of Columbia, for a public park—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. SHEPPARD: A bill (H. R. 17719) prescribing penalties for interference with official wireless messages—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. RODENBERG: A bill (H. R. 17720) to establish a park at Fourteenth street and Columbia road—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. MONDELL: A bill (H. R. 17721) to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent cruelty to animals while in transit by railroad or other means of transportation from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into or through another State or Territory or the District of Columbia, and repealing sections 4386, 4387, 4388, 4389, and 4390 of the United States Revised Statutes," approved June 29, 1906—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 22, 1908.

The Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE, offered the following prayer:

Let us now praise famous men, and our fathers that begat us. The Lord hath wrought great glory by them through His great power from the beginning.

* * * * * * *

Leaders of people by their counsels, and by their knowledge of learning meet for the people, wise and eloquent in their instructions.

* * * * * * *

All these were honored in their generations, and were the glory of their times.

And some there be who have left no memorial.

But these were merciful men, whose righteousness hath not been forgotten.

The people will tell of their wisdom, and the congregation will show forth their praise.

Let us pray. Father, it is for this that we have come together. Bless the memory of those to whom we owe so much, to whom this nation owes so much, and to whom the world owes so much, lest their memory should pass from the mind of men.

In Thy service, Father, show us what it is to live and move in God, to have Thy strength for our weakness, Thy wisdom for our direction. In Thy service may we remember how our fathers sought Thee and found Thee, how Thou hadst no need to seek them, but to give them strength and life and light and courage; and as we bring up our children and they our children's children, may it be in the memory of these great men, who lived for us, and who were willing to die for us, and day by day brought the world nearer and nearer to their God.

Father, we ask Thy blessing in every change, in Thy Providence, in every sudden word of Thine to us. In the midst of life we are in death. Thou art pleased to call day by day one and another to the higher service. We ask Thy blessing upon those who mourn to-day. We ask that Thou wouldst speak to each and to all of us, and show us what life is and what death is, that we may enter with glory into that higher service which is perfect freedom, where we see as we are seen and know as we are known.

Bless us in to-day's service of thanksgiving, bless us in to-day's sorrows, as Thine own children. Amen.

Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us. Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For Thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory forever. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

On request of Mr. KEAN and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Farewell Address of George Washington will be read, under the order of the Senate, by the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

An address of George Washington to the people of the United States September 19, 1797.

To the people of the United States:

FRIENDS AND FELLOW-CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed to decline being considered among the number of those out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you at the same time to do me the justice to be assured that this resolution has not been taken without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country, and that in withdrawing the tender of service, which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest, no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness, but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this previous to the last election had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence impelled me to abandon the idea. I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety, and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed toward the organization and administration of the Government the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and every day the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is intended to terminate the career of my political life my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me, and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise and as an instructive example in our annals that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead; amidst appearances sometimes dubious; vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging; in situations in which not unfrequently want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism, the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts and a guaranty of the plans by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence; that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual; that the free Constitution which is the work of your hands may be sacredly maintained; that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue; that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these States, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation and so prudent a use of this blessing as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection, and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare which can not end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger natural to that solicitude, urge me on an occasion like the present to offer to your solemn contemplation and to recommend to your frequent review some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all-important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget as an encouragement to it your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people is also now dear to you. It is justly so, for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence, the support of your tranquillity at home, your peace abroad, of your safety, of your prosperity, of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But as it is easy to foresee that from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth, as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed, it is of infinite moment that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it, accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can in any event be abandoned, and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth or choice of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have in a common cause fought and triumphed together. The independence and liberty you possess are the work of joint counsels and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings, and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest. Here every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The North, in an unrestrained intercourse with the South, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise and precious materials of manufacturing industry. The South, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the North, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the North, it finds its particular navigation invigorated, and while it contributes in different ways to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength to which itself is unequally adapted. The East, in a like intercourse with the West, already finds, and in the progressive improvements of interior communications by land and water will more and more find, a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad or manufactures at home. The West derives from the East supplies requisite to its growth and comfort, and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the West can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While, then, every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined can not fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts greater strength, greater resource, proportionately greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations, and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same governments, which their own rivalships alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues would stimulate and embitter. Hence, likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments which, under any form of government, are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is that your union ought to be considered as a main prop to your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the Union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? Let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who in any quarter may endeavor to weaken its bands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations—Northern and Southern, Atlantic and Western—whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of a party to acquire influence within particular districts is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You can not shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heartburnings which spring from these misrepresentations; they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our Western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head. They have seen in the negotiation by the Executive and in the unanimous ratification by the Senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at that event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the General Government and in the Atlantic States unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties—that with Great Britain and that with Spain—which secure to them everything they could desire in respect to our foreign relations toward confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? Will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such there are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your union a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute. They must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances in all times have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay by the adoption of a constitution of government better calculated than your former for an intimate union and for the efficacious management of your common concerts. This Government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government. But the constitution which at any time exists, till changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power and the right of the people to establish government presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations, under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberation and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle and of fatal tendency. They serve to organize faction; to give it an artificial and extraordinary force; to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of a party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community, and according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill-concerted and incongruous projects of faction rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans, digested by common counsels and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely in the course of time and things to become potent engines by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men will be enabled to subvert the power of the people and to usurp for themselves the reins of government, destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Toward the preservation of your Government and the permanency of your present happy state it is requisite not only that you steadily discountenance irregular oppositions to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretexts. One method of assault may be to effect in the forms of the Constitution alterations which may impair the energy of the system, and thus to undermine what can not be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments as other human institutions; that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country; that facility in changes upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion exposes to perpetual change, from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion; and remember especially that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular reference to the founding of them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

The spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism. But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual, and sooner or later the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purposes of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight), the common and continual mischief of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasionally riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which find a facilitated access to the government itself through the channels of party passion. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true, and in governments of a monarchical cast patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose, and there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be by force of public opinion to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent its bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming it should consume.

It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominates in the human heart is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasion by others, has been evinced by experiments, ancient and modern, some of them in our country and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If in the opinion of the people the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duty of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, Where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric? Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering also that timely disbursements to prepare for danger frequently prevent much greater disbursement to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions in time of peace to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burthen which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives; but it is necessary that public opinion should cooperate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty it is essential that you should practically bear in mind that toward the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper objects (which is always a choice of difficulties) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the Government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice toward all nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct. And can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and at no distant period a great nation to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt that in the course of time and things the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it? Can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others should be excluded, and that in place of them just and amicable feelings toward all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges toward another an habitual hatred or an habitual fondness is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur.

Hence frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation prompted by ill will and resentment sometimes impels to war the government contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject. At other times it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty, of nations has been the victim.

So, likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter without adequate inducement or justification. It leads also to concessions to the favorite nation of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from which equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted, or deluded citizens (who devote themselves to the favorite nation) facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country without odium, sometimes even with popularity, gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation a commendable deference for public opinion or a laudable zeal for public good the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils! Such an attachment of a small or weak toward a great and powerful nation dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter. Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence (I conjure you to believe me, fellow-citizens) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike of another cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots who may resist the intrigues of the favorite are liable to become suspected and odious, while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her frendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not legally hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interests, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world, so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than to private affairs that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But, in my opinion, it is unnecessary and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, liberal intercourse with all nations are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand, neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the Government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish—that they will control the usual current of the passions or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations. But if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good—that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism—this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far in the discharge of my official duties I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is that I have at least believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both Houses of Congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take and was bound in duty and interest to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance, and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without anything more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity toward other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress without interruption to that degree of strength and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my Administration I am unconscious of intentional error, I am, nevertheless, too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence, and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love toward it which is so natural to a man who views it in the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations, I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize without alloy the sweet enjoyment of partaking in the midst of my fellow-citizens the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever-favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors, and dangers.

GO: WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, September 19, 1796.

OFFICERS OF THE NAVY ON DUTY IN WASHINGTON.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a comunication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in further response to a resolution of the 21st ultimo, a list of officers on duty with the General Board, Board on Construction, and Joint Army and Navy Board, United States Navy, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

FINDINGS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate communications from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting certified copies of the findings of fact filed by the court in the following causes:

In the cause of N. C. McNeel, administrator of the personal estate of Paul McNeel, deceased, v. United States;

In the cause of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, of Harrodsburg, Ky., v. United States;

In the cause of G. B. Harper and J. D. Clearman, executors of William L. Clearman, deceased, v. United States;

In the cause of Alfred D. Bullock and 24 other claimants v. United States; and

In the cause of Robert B. Billings and 25 other claimants v. United States.

The foregoing findings were, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 9205. An act to make the provisions of an act of Congress approved February 28, 1891 (26 Stats., p. 796), applicable to the Territory of New Mexico;

H. R. 16955. An act to extend the time for building a bridge across Red River at Shreveport, La.; and

H. J. Res. 120. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to apply the unexpended balance of the donation made by the citizens of Dallas, Tex., under the provisions of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1905, to work in construction of Lock and Dam No. 2 in section 1 of Trinity River.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Washington, D. C., remonstrating against any change being made in the law or in the administration of the public schools of the city of Washington, and also against the passage of the so-called "Dolliver education bill," which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a memorial of the Bohemian Free Thought Federation of America, of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against the restoration of the motto "In God we trust" on all coins of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOPKINS presented a petition of Local Union No. 171, International Typographical Union, of Elgin, Ill., praying for the repeal of the duty on white paper, wood pulp, and the materials used in the manufacture thereof, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the board of directors of the Anna Fruit Growers' Association, of Anna, Ill., praying for the passage of the so-called "parcels-post bill," and also for the establishment of postal savings banks, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of the national executive committee of the National German-American Alliance of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the repeal of the present anticanteen law, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TALIAFERRO presented a petition of sundry citizens of Jacksonville, Fla., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the construction of at least one of the proposed new battle ships at the Government navy-yards, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a petition of members of the Department of Connecticut, United Spanish War Veterans, praying for the repeal of the present anticanteen law, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Lumber Dealers' Association of Connecticut, praying for the enactment of legislation to establish a national forest reserve in the southern Appalachian and White mountains, which was referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

He also presented a petition of the volunteer retired list committee of the State of Connecticut, praying for the enactment of legislation to create a volunteer retired list in the War and Navy Departments for the surviving officers of the civil war, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ALLISON. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6515) for the relief of J. A. Gallaher, administrator of the estate of Joseph H. Gallaher, deceased, to report it without amendment.

As the bill is local in its character, I give notice that I shall ask the Senate on Monday morning next to proceed to its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calender.

Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 15219) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, reported it with amendments and submitted a report thereon.

He also (for Mr. LA FOLLETTE), from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4791) providing for the determination and payment of claims of certain Indian traders and others against the Menominee tribe of Indians in Wisconsin and against individual members of said tribe, reported it with amendments and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CLAPP introduced a bill (S. 5586) for the removal of restrictions from part of the lands of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. TALIAFERRO introduced a bill (S. 5587) granting an increase of pension to Hutchinson Smith, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOPKINS introduced a bill (S. 5588) granting a pension to Emma T. Reid, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. FOSTER submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of the chief clerk and cashier, office of assistant treasurer at New Orleans, La., from $2,250 to $2,500, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TALIAFERRO submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $125,000 for the construction of a light vessel for service on St. John's River bar, Florida, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PILES submitted an amendment relative to the assay office at Seattle, Wash., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was refered to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 9205. An act to make the provisions of an act of Congress approved February 28, 1891 (26 Stats., p. 796), applicable to the Territory of New Mexico, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The following bill and joint resolution were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

H. R. 16955. An act to extend the time for building a bridge across Red River at Shreveport, La.; and

H. J. Res. 120. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to apply the unexpended balance of the donation made by the citizens of Dallas, Tex., under the provisions of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1905, to work in construction of Lock and Dam No. 2 in section 1 of Trinity River.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 1 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 24, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 22, 1908.

The House was called to order at 12 o'clock m. by Hon. JOHN DALZELL, of Pennsylvania, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

I hereby designate Hon. JOHN DALZELL, of Pennsylvania, as Speaker pro tempore.

J. G. CANNON, Speaker.

FEBRUARY 22, 1908.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We lift up our hearts in gratitude to Thee, our Father in heaven, for this day, an anniversary which marks an epoch in the world's history and which is dear not only to the heart of the American, but to the liberty-loving, wherever he may be. For who does not know and revere our Washington, ours once, now the heritage of the world. Like the solitary mountain, which lifts its head sublimely above the clouds and looks serenely down upon the world, so he stands, solitary and alone, supremely great and glorious. Spotless in character, clear in judgment, pure in motive, unswerving in integrity, a patriot, a soldier, a statesman, a Christian, through whose achievements he builded for himself a monument more grand and imposing than the mind of man has yet conceived. We thank Thee for what he did, yet more, for what he was, and we pray that he may ever be an inspiration to the patriot, the warrior, the statesman, the Christian citizen, and glory and honor be Thine forever. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SQUIRE J. CARLIN AND OTHERS.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from further consideration of the bill H. R. 586, and that the House concur in the amendments of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY] asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the consideration of the bill H. R. 586, and that the same be considered in the House at this time.

The amendments of the Senate were read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this the bill where the Senate put together the House bills in one bill?

Mr. SULLOWAY. That is exactly it. These all passed the House on January 17.

Mr. MANN. They were simply put in one bill?

Mr. SULLOWAY. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The question was taken, and the Senate amendments were agreed to.

DAMS ACROSS SAVANNAH RIVER.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, S. 3726, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Twin City Power Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of South Carolina, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a dam across the Savannah River at or near where Dortons Creek, in the county of Edgefield, State of South Carolina, empties into the Savannah River, and also a dam across the said river at or near the southern end of Prices Island, in said river, and about 5 miles from the mouth of Dortons Creek, in the State of South Carolina, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906: Provided, That one of said dams shall be completed within three years and the other within five years from the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That the said Twin City Power Company is authorized to construct, operate, and maintain a dam across the Savannah River at what is known as Crouchs Bluff, in Edgefield County, S. C.: Provided, That the said site at Crouchs Bluff can be obtained by contract from the owners thereof; And provided further, That said dam at Crouchs Bluff shall be constructed under the provisions of the said act of June 21, 1906: Provided further, That said dam if constructed at Crouchs Bluff shall be completed within three years.

SEC. 3. That the act entitled "An act authorizing the Twin City Power Company to build two dams across the Savannah River above the city of Augusta, in the State of Georgia," approved February 27, 1907, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 4. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. HARDWICK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid upon the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5133. An act to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the Winnipeg, Yankton and Gulf Railroad Company to construct a combined railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Yankton, S. Dak;

S. 4351. An act for the relief of the Alaska Pacific Railway and Terminal Company;

S. 4248. An act to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at Kearney, Nebr.;

S. 1702. An act to reimburse H. R. King;

S. 1617. An act to quiet title to certain land in Dona Ana County, N. Mex.;

S. 1392. An act for the relief of the heirs of Salvador Costa;

S. 486. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of apublic building thereon at Victoria, in the State of Texas;

S. 160. An act to aid in the erection of a monument or memorial at Point Pleasant, W. Va., to commemorate the battle of the Revolution fought at that point between the colonial troops and Indians October 10, 1774;

S. 5255. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 5254. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent children of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 5083. An act to amend section 1 of the passenger act of 1882;

S. R. 48. Joint resolution instructing the Attorney-General to institute certain suits, and so forth;

S. R. 49. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to permit not exceeding seven Filipinos to receive instruction at the United States Military Academy;

S. R. 51. Joint resolution providing for additional lands for Idaho under the provisions of the Carey Act;

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2420) granting an increase of pension to Margaret K. Hern, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. TALIAFERRO as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill and joint resolution of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12401. An act to legalize a bridge across the Mississippi River at Rice, Minn.

H. J. Res. 138. Joint resolution to continue in full force and effect an act entitled "An act to provide for the appropriate marking of the graves of the soldiers and sailors of the Confederate army and navy who died in northern prisons and were buried near the prisons where they died, and for other purposes."

POLICE FOR HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the privileged report from the Committee on Accounts, which was presented yesterday and printed in the RECORD, and by unanimous consent comes up to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. CURRIER] calls up a report from the Committee on Accounts. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided by law the following sums as compensation for a police force for the House Office Building, to be appointed by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives: One captain at $1,600 per annum; two lieutenants at $1,200 per annum each; and twenty-one privates at $1,050 per annum each.

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Speaker, this is a plan for policing the House Office Building, which will continue in force throughout this Congress unless otherwise provided for. The committee recommend that the resolution as introduced be amended so as to reduce the number of lieutenants from three to two, and the number of privates from thirty to twenty-one. We believe that if we have erred at all it is in trying to be too economical. We do not believe that the House Office Building can be adequately policed with a less force than this. This resolution was adopted and the report prepared something more than a week ago by the Committee on Accounts, and since that time conditions have developed which indicate that the plan suggested by the committee for stationing the officers ought to be modified; but that needs no action on the part of the committee or the House, because it was always within the control of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The temporary steps will be almost immediately constructed to the middle door of the rotunda, but I am informed this morning that the permanent steps leading to all three doors of the rotunda will not be constructed until after this session of Congress. So for the present, at least, only one officer will be needed in the rotunda, instead of the two that the committee suggested in its report. But since we made the report it has become evident that an officer is needed in the basement. The plan suggested by the committee provided for no officer below the first floor, except that during eight hours out of the twenty-four there should be one officer stationed in the subway. We think now that there should be an officer in the basement, where teams are driving in and out, and people all the time are coming and going. As I say, I do not believe that we can get along with a less force, and I am certainly inclined to think that experience will lead us to conclude a little later on that there must be a slight increase in the force provided. The plan suggested in the report of the committee provides for an officer sixteen hours of the day on each of the upper floors—second, third, and fourth. One member of the Committee on Accounts did not concur, otherwise I think it was a unanimous report from the Committee on Accounts. One member thought that these officers were not needed. Of course Members of the House can judge about as well regarding that matter as a member of the committee, but the experience of the last few days, particularly on last Sunday, I think indicates that there should be an officer during sixteen hours of the day on each of the upper floors. I will be glad to answer any questions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want so much to interrupt the gentleman as I desire to be recognized to offer an amendment to the resolution and to be heard upon the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman will yield to me for that purpose——

Mr. CURRIER. A little later on.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, there is one captain of police for the Capitol building. Is that correct?

Mr. CURRIER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And the committee think it is still necessary to have a captain of police for the Office Building?

Mr. CURRIER. Yes; I may say that the Office police force is necessarily entirely distinct from the Capitol police force. This police force is appointed by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, paid by the House, and entirely under the control of the House; while the Capitol police is a force which is controlled both by the House and the Senate, is paid for six months by the Senate and six months by the House; and the House has no exclusive control of the force at all. So that the force in the Office Building stands entirely different from the Capitol police.

Mr. MANN. Now, as I understand it, practically the House Sergeant-at-Arms has complete control of the police force on this side of the Capitol building—practically.

Mr. CURRIER. The officers of the Capitol police force, in their employment, alternate between the House and Senate ends of the Capitol. Now I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. How large is this force?

Mr. CURRIER. There are twenty-one privates and three officers.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What are the officers?

Mr. CURRIER. The officers are one captain and two lieutenants. The committee felt that on each watch there should be an officer. The resolution, as introduced originally, provided for a captain and three lieutenants. The committee felt that when the captain was on duty they could certainly dispense with having a lieutenant on watch, and so we offer an amendment which will reduce the number of lieutenants from three to two.

Mr. BOUTELL. What provision is made for the proper uniforming of this force?

Mr. CURRIER. These men are to be uniformed like the Capitol police. They are to be policemen and uniformed as policemen.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Are these to be annual appointments?

Mr. CURRIER. These are to be annual appointments.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Twenty-four men to be on duty all the year around?

Mr. CURRIER. Yes; all the year around.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. We are to have twenty-four men for nine months of the year watching an empty building. Is that the idea?

Mr. CURRIER. Not necessarily. The Capitol police force consists of sixty-nine men, and the Capitol policemen are appointed in the same way.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. But you do not answer the question. We are to have twenty-four men for nine months every other year watching an empty building?

Mr. CURRIER. Not necessarily.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Why not?

Mr. CURRIER. You do not take into account that anybody may happen to be sick, and there may have to be a vacation given to these men during the summer months, when some of the doors can be locked. That will be a very busy building. The folding room will be there; the document room will be there; the post-office is going over there. That building will be open every day of the year, and the vacations must be worked out during the summer season—during the vacation season.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRIER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says the vacation season must be worked out. The committee has formulated a scheme for the use of these twenty-one officers, which involves the taking care of so many doors. Does the gentleman apprehend that there will be any occasion during the recess of Congress to keep six doors open in the Office Building?

Mr. CURRIER. No; the gentleman does not; but the gentleman does apprehend that three or four doors will be kept open. This building will be visited all through the vacation by the public, just as the Capitol is. In this building will be stored an immense amount of valuable documents and everything of that kind.

Mr. MANN. The documents will be stored in the basement—folding-room documents?

Mr. CURRIER. If the Capitol needs police protection, the Office Building needs it just as much.

Mr. MANN. Well, the Capitol is the Mecca of people who come here from all over the country. The Office Building is a mere office building. There is no special interest in people visiting the Office Building during a recess of Congress.

Mr. CURRIER. If the gentleman has passed through the subway he would think that it was an object of interest, if he met the people passing back and forth.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not intimate that I have not been in the Office Building.

Mr. CURRIER. I did not know whether the gentleman's room was in the Capitol or not.

Mr. MANN. While I have a room in the Capitol, I think I have been in the Office Building probably more frequently than any other Member of the House.

Mr. CURRIER. I realize that. I did not stop to think that the gentleman had entire charge of the assignment of rooms in the Office Building.

Mr. MANN. And I think I am perfectly familiar with the subway; but I do not see how that bears on the use of the Office Building during vacation, when I doubt whether any Member of Congress will maintain his office there.

Mr. CURRIER. However that may be, the building will be used and occupied all the time, and the public will be in the building.

Mr. MANN. To a limited extent undoubtedly, but there will be no occasion for keeping six entrances or six doors open.

Mr. CURRIER. I do not believe that this force is adequate, until some regulation is made in reference to the public using the subway. This resolution provides for police protection in the subway only eight hours out of the twenty-four. Last Sunday the Office Building was used as a skating rink. There are Members of this House who found their rooms full of a rough crowd of people. Away long after midnight, strangers, colored people, were found here in this Capitol, and when asked how they got here said they came over "through the cave." I doubt very much whether it can be adequately protected under the recommendations of the committee now, for I do believe that more police assistance will be needed in patrolling the subway, unless some regulation is made by Congress to exclude the public, or to exclude the public during certain hours.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says that Members of the House found their office rooms over there filled with people of a rough character. I heard that statement made before and I made inquiry as to whether any locks had been broken or any doors had been broken open, and was informed that none had been. So I question whether anybody found any rough people in their rooms, because I do not believe any Member would invite them in.

Mr. CURRIER. I have not heard of any doors being broken in, but a Member told me that he found a crowd in his room, rough and impudent.

Mr. MANN. Nobody could get into the room without the doors being open, and the doors are all provided with good locks; and if there is any Member who through negligence does not lock his door when he leaves his office, then he ought to be given a course of instruction instead of a policeman.

Mr. CURRIER. I do not know how they got into the room, but I am inclined to accept the statement that a Member of Congress makes as being correct.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recognized for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. CURRIER. I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi for an amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe any Member of this House has ever accused me of stingy "cheese paring." I do not believe I have ever been accused of being illiberal toward the majority as to their legitimate patronage. It does seem to me, however, that policing this Office Building with twenty-four police employees is beyond all measure a piece of extravagance. I desire to move to amend by striking out the words "twenty-one," and substituting the word "ten." There will be left then three officers and ten men to police a little office building. Office buildings in Chicago and New York and various other places containing a good many more people than this building, are policed by a less force than that would be. That will give two men on each floor of the building, and two men to spare, and three officers to spare over and above that; and these men by doing eight hours' work each, making sixteen hours' service for two sets of guards, will be sufficient. It seems to me that they will furnish an ample force for this building.

I do not desire to discuss it because the Members of the House understand the situation as well as I do. I do not desire to go into the reasons for making a large appropriation. Human nature is human nature, Mr. Speaker, and we all understand it. But I would not like to see the patronage of the majority side of the House extended beyond all measure of seeming necessity. It seems to me to put twenty-four men to guard this building is extending it to too large a degree.

Mr. CURRIER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. CURRIER. That would provide only five men on duty at any time?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Five men on duty at a time, heaven knows is amply sufficient. I believe that there is not an office building of that size and with that occupancy in any large city in this country that is as amply policed all the time as this would then be. It is not a building where lawlessness is apt to take root. It is a building occupied by Members of the House of Representatives, well behaved as they always are; where there is less need for police protection than in almost any other building in the United States.

Mr. CURRIER. I am told that a fight took place in the subway last Sunday night.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, if there had been one policeman he would have been sufficient for one fight.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That would depend upon who was doing the fighting. [Laughter.]

Mr. CURRIER. The policeman in the subway is only on from 9 to 5.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This will provide a force enough to keep a policeman or two in the subway all the time. I expect what took place last Sunday took place because things have not been organized yet, and there was no force of any sort in the building, and people were going in and out of the building freely without any sort of interruption.

Mr. CURRIER. The gentleman's amendment provides only for two watches, so that for eight hours during the twenty-four hours no man could get in or out of the Office Building. Does it not occur to the gentleman that a Member might want to get to his room during that eight hours?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the gentleman's pardon; there would still be three officers and two privates to spare.

Mr. CURRIER. The gentleman's scheme gives five men, and there would be one on each floor, and that would leave one door that is unguarded. If he puts a man in the subway, there is not a single man on the force that he can station at a single door.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What other employees are there besides—janitors?

Mr. CURRIER. There are no janitors yet; there are charwomen.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There will be janitors.

Mr. CURRIER. Well, I don't know.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course there will be.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The only janitors there now are the janitors provided for the committee rooms that have been moved over there. Their services, so far as cleaning up the rooms, is done by charwomen or some one under the direction of the Superintendent of the Capitol. There is no provision there now for the preservation or the care of the rooms, and the only janitors are the janitors for the committee rooms.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, Mr. Speaker, I proposed the amendment I desired to propose, and I yield the floor.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi offer an amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. My amendment is to strike out the word "twenty-one" where it occurs and substitute the word "ten" in lieu thereof.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The gentleman means to have ten men and no officers?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; the officers are left undisturbed.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I will state to the gentleman that if he will make that fifteen men and three officers I think he will cover the situation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If this fails I will try that.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out "twenty-one" and inserting in lieu thereof "ten."

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say in reference to that amendment that that will provide just five men on a watch in the Office Building, as it would cover two watches in the day. For eight hours in the day it would be left entirely without protection. If only five men are put in there on a watch and the arrangement made, as suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi, one to each floor, there is not one single door in that building that would have any protection whatever.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But we do not need a policeman at each door all the time.

Mr. CURRIER. The committee believes that on every door the public are coming through there should be a policeman, and that there will be trouble in that building unless there is one. We stand absolutely for that, except, I might say, that with the three doors entering the rotunda two officers certainly could take care of the three doors, and possibly one could. The arrangement we are suggesting now is for only one officer, but that rotunda will be a bureau of information for the public, and they should be fairly served, and I do not think they can be fairly served in that rotunda with its three doors with less than three men, although the arrangement we are trying to put in force now involves for the present only one man in the rotunda with its three doors.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the gentleman know of any office building in New York or Chicago that has a policeman at every door all the time?

Mr. CURRIER. The gentleman lives in a little country town in New Hampshire, and he is not familiar with the policing of office buildings in the great cities, but I will tell the gentleman how the buildings are taken care of in this city. The Department of Agriculture, not a large building——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I did not ask about public offices. I asked about commercial office buildings.

Mr. CURRIER. I want to call the attention of the committee to the method adopted in the buildings in this city.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I admit that all the public buildings have too many policemen.

Mr. CURRIER. They have a captain and lieutenant and 25 privates in the Department of Agriculture, 4 more privates than we are asking for here. In the Department of Commerce and Labor, they have 27 privates. In the Interior Department, 58 privates; that does not include the Pension Office, which has 20, and the Geological Survey, which has 1. The State, War and Navy building has 1 captain, 2 lieutenants, and 49 privates. The Post-Office building, 1 captain, 2 lieutenants, 29 privates; the Treasury, 2 captains, 4 lieutenants, and 120 privates; the Government Printing Office has 1 captain, 2 lieutenants, and 64 privates.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, if the gentleman will permit another question, does not just what he has read suggest that there ought to be a reform in the Government in the direction of greater economy?

Mr. CURRIER. Oh, the gentleman has no information that would lead him to think that the force could be reduced in those buildings.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the gentleman think that this would be information, that office buildings for commercial purposes, with people coming in and going out all the time, are not, in any part of this country, as far as I know, unless the gentleman knows to the contrary, furnished with a policeman at each door, or with any sort of policing at all commensurate with this?

Mr. CURRIER. I want to say that these Departments are closed to the public except for seven hours in the day, and this building is open to the public absolutely for sixteen hours in the day.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say the Departments are open from 9 until 2.

Mr. MANN. That is what the watchmen are for, to keep people out after those hours.

Mr. CURRIER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And not over here. That is their principal occupation, to sit at the door and keep people out after 2 o'clock.

Mr. CURRIER. I do not believe that the Members of this House will be satisfied for one week to have every one of the doors in that building without any police protection, with drunken men, hoboes, and everybody else at perfect liberty to go in, with no one to question their right.

Now, gentlemen, this committee has no pride of opinion about this matter. We went to work to figure this down to the lowest possible number that we believed the Members could get along with. If the Members do not want the police force there it is easy enough to vote it out. We have no pride of opinion about this matter at all, but we believe we have brought in a recommendation here along lines just as economical as we could make it; that is all. I now yield to my colleague from New York [Mr. GOULDEN].

Mr. ADAIR rose.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire to ask a question?

Mr. ADAIR. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. ADAIR. I just want to ask a question of the gentleman from New Hampshire—that is, if he has seen any hobos or any drunkards lounging around the Office Building and going in and out of the doors, and does the gentleman believe it will be necessary to have men stationed at these doors to keep out those men in these prosperous times?

Mr. CURRIER. The gentleman from New Hampshire is informed that last Sunday afternoon just that sort of people were in there. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] to relate his experience last Sunday afternoon.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I confess to having violated one of the commandments on last Sunday afternoon by going to my office and working. I left my door open for just a moment. There were a number of children skating up and down in the hallway on roller skates. They came into the office, went around the table and took hold of and turned over the books and papers which lay on the table; a number of addressed slips on the table were turned over and mixed up. I followed them out into the hallway and saw the halls were then filled with people and no one to direct them where to go.

Now, I submit to the Members of the House that an office building of this character, being a public building, is a vastly different building from an office building in which you or I may have our office in our home city. The building is public, and the public is entitled to admittance to it. The people have the right to know what is there and what it is there for. They should be admitted under regulations, and I submit to the Members of the House that such regulations can not be provided for by four or five men—taking into account the size of the building and the number of doorways it has.

Mr. ADAIR. May I ask a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. ADAIR. Were you disturbed by anyone else except the children?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I was not.

Mr. ADAIR. Do you believe that any great number of police would be requested or required to keep out children from the Office Building; do you not believe one policeman could keep out of the Office Building those children and others on Sunday and——

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not believe one policeman can guard the doorways of that Office Building on Sunday or any other day and give the public such attention as it is entitled to.

Mr. MADDEN. Do not you think the Office Building ought to be closed on Sunday?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I should have been sorry to have seen it closed on last Sunday, as I had to do some work which I could not have done at my home because my books and papers were in the Office Building, and I had to go there to do the work.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know whether the visit which the gentleman enjoyed from these children has given rise to the rumor circulated over the House that last Sunday this building was filled with hobos and toughs and disreputables, and that they camped in the room of some Member of the House? Is that the bottom of that story?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am not in position to advise the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman has not heard of anyone else's room being invaded? The gentleman was called upon as a profert, as I understood, to prove the story?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I heard what the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. CURRIER] said. I had asked the gentleman when this resolution providing for these policemen was going to be reported, and spoke of the necessity for it to him and stated what I saw there on Sunday.

Mr. CURRIER. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] such time as he may desire.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I am a member of the Committee on Accounts as well as of the subcommittee of three who have investigated this matter in every detail. We have gone over it carefully, and find, after consulting the Sergeant-at-Arms, a reliable authority, and the Superintendent of Buildings and Grounds, examining into the matter carefully and closely, that it is impossible to properly guard this magnificent Office Building with a less force than that which we have recommended to this House. And I beg to call the attention of the gentlemen of this House to the fact that there are valuable documents and property stored there belonging to the Government, and there will be much more in the future. It is a well-known fact that large amounts of valuable property in and around the Capitol disappear. It is also a well-known fact, substantiated by the Sergeant-at-Arms, that much Government property is lost each year even with the large force guarding it at the present time. We think that the Office Building, with its valuable documents and property of the Government—that no man should be allowed to leave that building unless he is known to an officer at the door to be entitled to carry away property. We have gone over this matter carefully, and I beg to call the attention of the House to one of the recommendations made by the committee. If the resolution as amended be adopted, it is proposed to place twelve policemen at six doors on the first floor, covering two watches of eight hours each. There are eight doors on the first and second floors accessible to the public. We have cut off two of those doors in the rotunda and placed but one policeman on duty for the three doors. At each of the other doors, five in number, we have placed a watchman for the period of sixteen hours, making in all——

Mr. CURRIER. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. GOULDEN. Certainly.

Mr. CURRIER. And when the building is completed there will be still another door at the east of the rotunda on the first floor, will there not?

Mr. GOULDEN. There will be. That will make the eight doors. We have provided that these eight doors now in use shall be guarded by six watchmen for sixteen hours, namely, two watches of eight hours each.

During the remainder of the twenty-four hours—that is, from 12 at midnight until 8 in the morning—that two doors only shall be guarded, in order to give egress and ingress to anyone who has business in the house and a right to be there, making fourteen in all. Now, I believe this is as small a number as possible properly guard the ground floor of that building.

In the judgment of the committee, based upon the knowledge of officials in authority controlling the building, namely, the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Superintendent of the Capitol, we believe that there ought to be on the second, third, and fourth floors during sixteen hours of the day a policeman. They will do duty on the three floors from 8 o'clock in the morning until midnight. That will be six additional, making in all twenty men. There is also in the basement or subway a necessity for a policeman during the busy hours of the day, namely, from 9 to 5 o'clock—the hours in which excursionists and the public generally have access and believe they have a right to it—to guard against anything going wrong in the basement, and to protect life and property.

I visited the building last night at 10 o'clock and found people on each of the floors from the fourth down to the basement who apparently had no business there. I believe that we need these policemen for the safety of the property of the Government and the protection of this magnificent building upon which we have spent a large amount of money, as well as for convenience of visitors, who require adequate protection, and the committee have brought in this report asking for twenty-one policemen and three officers. Originally we had decided to recommend three lieutenants and one captain; now we make the captain, while a superior officer and in command of the whole force, perform his tour of duty—namely, eight hours. Now, at night, from 12 until 8 in the morning, one of these officers will be in charge and will be expected to have control of the whole building, with but two men to aid him. He will be required to patrol the second, third, and fourth floors and see that the basement and subway is properly looked after and cared for.

This building, I may say to my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], differs very materially from city office buildings.

I believe that I am as familiar with the office building question in the city of New York as any man on the floor of this House. I want to say that this is an entirely different proposition from a city office building. I know it is so in the one that I am in. That building closes at 8 o'clock, and you can only obtain admission after that hour by ringing up the night janitor of the building. This Office Building of Congressmen is open to the public. It is a building that the public believe that they have a right to visit during day and night and therefore should be properly guarded and protected, and the public given an opportunity to see how well and fairly Congress has treated its Members. They also will want to visit friends and their Members. I have callers with business matters, at my office every day. They do not know where to go. There is no one at the doors to direct them. I believe in what the gentleman from Kansas who has so ably said, that there are hoodlums found there with boys and girls skating through the halls. I have seen five or six boys rambling about that building as if they owned it and had a right to be there in daytime. I believe that we have enough pride in the building to see that it must be properly protected. I have no personal interest whatever in the matter, and care not in the slightest about it, except as to the number of men to be engaged in this work as an individual Member. It is for you to say whether you will have the property properly protected and the interests of the Members and the public guarded. The property of the Government must be also considered, or do you wish to allow that property to be stolen and the building abused and disfigured?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GOULDEN. Glad to have you do so.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Will you explain to the House, and thereby inform me as well as the House, what the duties of these three officers will be—a captain and two lieutenants to take charge of twenty-one men?

Mr. GOULDEN. In reply to the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota, it is very evident that he has never had much military service. [Laughter.] If he had he would not ask the question. [Renewed laughter.] Every man here knows, who knows anything of military matters, from a theoretical standpoint even, that we must have some one in command and who can be held responsible. The lieutenant must see that the men are properly placed and are doing their duty; he must visit each man upon his post of duty, and if there is any man sick or absent he must supply his place. In other words, he is in command for the time being of the force. The captain must supervise and superintend the lieutenants as well as the twenty-one privates in the service. He is responsible for the efficiency and discipline of the force.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will state to the gentleman that for five years I was captain of a military company, if I remember correctly, of nearly 100 men. [Applause.] Now, can the gentleman state a military record better than that?

Mr. GOULDEN. I apologize to the gentleman for having made the mistake.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. And I will say furthermore that these 100 men, or nearly 100 men, were as law-abiding and peaceable as, probably no more so than, you intend your 21 policemen to be.

Mr. GOULDEN. I apologized to the gentleman, because I supposed that he had had no military experience, but I take it from his statements that he has a good record as a soldier.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. And furthermore I will state——

Mr. GOULDEN. I only yielded for a question, Captain. [Laughter.] The gentleman undoubtedly had two or three lieutenants under him who assisted in the discipline of that company. And what would the company have been without the captain or some one in authority to command it? In addition to that he had noncommissioned officers——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will state to the gentleman that the two lieutenants under me would, at any time during my absence for one, two, or three days, have managed these 100 men almost as well, if not quite as well, as I did myself. And, in my opinion, one lieutenant here at this time can successfully manage twenty-one policemen, although I only hope there will be but ten under his command.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman qualified his remarks by saying "almost as well." Now, that "almost," I think, answers his own question. But in addition to the two lieutenants he had his noncommissioned officers, and he had a disciplined troop under him; and I have no doubt that, owing to the superior ability and discipline of the captain himself, he had such a company that they would have gone along without any officers, except the noncommissioned, at all, but we do not have the same discipline in this case. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. No; but were ten of them, or ten similar ones here, they could, with one lieutenant, guard and properly care for this building at all times.

Mr. GOULDEN. I can not agree with the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The gentleman states that the building ought to be guarded to prevent the contents of the rooms being stolen.

Mr. GOULDEN. No; I said the property of the Government stored there all through the various rooms, particularly in the basement rooms.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Is not that property under lock and key, or may it not be?

Mr. GOULDEN. I am afraid it is not under lock and key.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Will it not be under lock and key?

Mr. GOULDEN. I am unable to answer the gentleman's question, because I can not see into the future. It should be, I am sure.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The gentleman, to my certain knowledge, occupies a portion of a large business block on lower Broadway, in New York City, which we heard about a year or so ago. I should like to inquire whether the owners of that building keep a large force of policemen on duty day and night to keep the property of tenants from being stolen?

Mr. GOULDEN. Yes; certainly we do. We have a policeman at the door, there being but one entrance to the building. At night we have a watchman, who is in the building at all times during the time that the offices are closed.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. GOULDEN. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Do they keep policemen on the twelfth, fourteenth, or fifteenth floor?

Mr. SHERMAN. But at night the front door is locked.

Mr. GOULDEN. Yes; that is correct. The building has but twelve floors, and the policeman at the entrance during the day and the elevator boys take the place of watchmen to see that no questionable characters are admitted or allowed to be in the building at any time.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That is all we propose to do here, and it can be done effectively with ten men.

Mr. GOULDEN. In reply to the gentleman, if he will allow me, my own office building is a comparatively small one, being only 25 by 100 feet, and my friend from New York [Mr. PARSONS] informs me that in all the larger buildings they have officers specially employed by the owners to pass through the building every hour, to look after it. No, I would say in reply to my friend from Michigan, the case is entirely different—no comparison is possible between office buildings in large cities and the Congressional Office Building, erected to enable the Members to perform their duties in a proper and expeditious manner. Hitherto a Member had no place to receive his constitutents, no office in which to do his work, answer his voluminous correspondence, prepare his bills, study, and arrange for their passage, or to oppose those of an objectionable character. His papers and books were in half dozen places and not available when wanted. This building now in use is of great convenience to the Members and to the comfort of our constitutents. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAIR. I understood the gentleman from New York to state that at 10 o'clock at night he observed in the corridors of the Office Building over here a great many people who had no business there?

Mr. GOULDEN. Not a great many, but some people who apparently did not belong there.

Mr. ADAIR. A number of people?

Mr. GOULDEN. Yes.

Mr. ADAIR. He also said that this was a public building, and that it was thrown open to the public. Is it not true that many people walk through these corridors at night for the purpose of looking at the building, with no other purpose in view? And is it necessary that the public, who have a right to enter these doors and walk through these halls, shall be guarded by a policeman at each door and have their actions closely watched while they are in the building? Have they not the right to go there as citizens of Washington?

Mr. GOULDEN. In reply to the gentleman, I would say that these people ought to have a right there; but what is to prohibit questionable characters, thieves, hoodlums, and others equally bad and undesirable from entering the building at any hour, unless the building is guarded properly?

Mr. ADAIR. I should like to say that I do not believe there is any Member of this House who has been in this Office Building since it was opened as much as I have. I have been in my office in the building every night until after 10 o'clock, except four or five nights. I have been in the Office Building every Sunday except one, and I am sorry to confess that I have had to work on Sunday in order to keep my work up; and during that time I have never seen anyone in the building that needed to be guarded by police or interfered with by police or to be watched.

Mr. GOULDEN. Perhaps the gentleman is so innocent himself that he would not believe guilt in anyone else, and perhaps he would not for this reason know guilty or disreputable ones if he saw them. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAIR. The gentleman must not think for a moment that I do not know or recognize guilty people. But I must say that I have not seen a hobo or a drunken man in Washington since I came here the 1st of December.

Mr. GOULDEN. I want to congratulate the gentleman, because he is one of the few lucky men. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] says that he has the gentleman from Illinois beaten to a finish in the matter of being in his office much of the time, perhaps occasionally sleeping there. [Laughter.]

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman from New York is mistaken; the "gentleman from Illinois" does not sleep there, but he did take exception to the statement of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR] when he says that he devotes more time to his office than anybody else.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me?

Mr. GOULDEN. I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. CLAYTON. I understand there may be a good deal of patriotism involved in this proposition offered by the Committee on Accounts to increase the police force of the great House Office Building. On account of the prevailing conditions in the country we know that there are thousands of idle men, and the Committee on Accounts evidently is trying to provide some employment for some of those idle men. It may be that it is a most worthy and patriotic motive that actuates them. I want to know of the gentleman from New York just how far the Committee on Accounts has been influenced, if at all, by the suggestion from the Philadelphia Inquirer, a leading Republican paper, in an editorial of this Saturday morning. I will read a part of it.

Mr. GOULDEN. I shall have to object to the gentleman's reading editorials in my time.

Mr. CLAYTON. It is not very long, and it is couched in such beautiful and pure English.

Mr. GOULDEN. I will withdraw the objection. The gentleman may read it.

Mr. CLAYTON (reading):

> So much for this feature of the industrial situation. There is another—the side which must appeal to everyone—the enforced idleness of the many thousands of employees in the manufacturing sections of the city. This idleness is more general than has been supposed by those not fully informed. It will be surprising news to a great many citizens of Philadelphia that something like 18,000 men who are dependent upon the textile industry of Kensington alone are out of work.
> Of course, this condition is the outcome of the panic of last fall. The dearth of money stopped development in all directions. Railroads felt it. All industrial enterprises felt it. There was a sudden halt throughout the country.
> What can be done, except to wait for the return of confidence and that demand for the products of the mills which prosperity brings, we do not know. But of one thing we are convinced, and that is that when such periods of depression come upon us it is the duty of the Government, both national and municipal, to throw as much employment in the way of laborers as is possible.
> We have no sympathy whatever with that narrow view that Congress seems to hold, that no more money should be expended at this time than is absolutely necessary. Suppose the income of the Government should fall short of current expenses for a brief time, what of that? We all know that it can be but temporary. We have a vast surplus. What is a surplus for if not to be used when it would do the most good?

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, that is one of the best speeches of the many good ones I have ever heard from this side of the House [Laughter.] The committee did not have in mind that article, I am confident. I had not read it, and I do not know that any other member of the committee had done so.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is an editorial from this morning's paper.

Mr. GOULDEN. Then it did not influence the committee in making this recommendation. We believe that what we have recommended is the best, the most economical, and for the interests of the Office Building, the Members, and their constituents, as well as for visitors seeing the sights of the capital. The whole matter is now in the hands of the Members of Congress, those directly interested, and their judgment, whatever it may be, will prove entirely satisfactory to the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut.

[Mr. LILLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that a point of order would lie against the gentleman's substitute. We have not any power to detail men from this Capitol police, the joint force of the Senate and House, to the House Office Building. That could not be done. It would take more than half of the employees at the House end. I wish to say in answer to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR], who says he has never seen a drunken man or a disorderly man in the House Office Building or in the city of Washington, that while he was talking a Member of Congress said to me that within a day or two a drunken man had gone into the rooms of one whole floor begging. In reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], if that is adopted and his suggestion prevails, not one single door in that building will have a police officer. There will be one officer on each floor and one in the subway. It provides for only ten men, and under the law they can work only eight hours, so that there will be only five on duty at a time, one on each floor and one in the subway, with every single doorway unprotected. If this House thinks that the number named by the committee is too large, it can far better dispense with the men on the four floors than to dispense with the men at the doors. If the House feels this ought to be reduced, then I suggest that we leave enough to take care of the doors and take them off the floors.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CURRIER. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. Is there any necessity to have all those doors open at night?

Mr. CURRIER. During the night hours we have only two doors in the entire building open. We provide for only two officers during the night. Mr. Speaker, I now move the previous question on the resolution and the amendments thereto.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the gentleman from New Hampshire yield me two minutes before he demands the previous question?

Mr. CURRIER. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want just time enough to read from this morning's Washington Post an article which has come to my attention, in answer to the article read from the Philadelphia Inquirer by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON]. This is under date of yesterday, and it is as follows:

NEW YORK, February 21, 1908.

It is estimated by one of the managers of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor that there are approximately 30,000 homeless men in New York to-day. Of these probably 60 per cent are nonresidents, while it is the society's estimate that about 1 per cent would work if they were given employment.

Though the poverty of the deserving unemployed is real and their need of help constant, the society has reason to believe that conditions are improving, the number of men out of work growing smaller, and, finally, that the total of the deserving class of the unemployed has been overestimated. The great majority, a society manager said, belong to the vagrant class, and "work" the organization when they can get a chance to do so.

"These men go to the mission," he said, "and get all they can, then to ministers and get all they can there; next they fall into the bread line, and in a few days, when they think we have forgotten them, come back to us. We have tried to distinguish the deserving, but when the past of the run of applicants is sifted not more than 1 per cent are honest or sober or willing to work when they can."

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Speaker, I now move the previous question on the resolution and the amendments thereto.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the gentleman does that will he yield me two minutes?

Mr. CURRIER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], and with equal relevancy to the question under consideration, I hold in my hand some resolutions from the National Convention of the Unemployed. [Laughter.] I remember that in 1893 we upon this side of the Chamber could not enter the Chamber and sit here five minutes without having somebody upon the other side of the Chamber refer to that great leader and general of the unemployed, Gen. Jacob S. Coxey, of Mount Vernon, Ohio. I have the honor, or the trepidation, rather, to announce now that Jacob S. Coxey, of Mount Vernon, has announced that the conditions have rearisen that require him to move upon Washington at the head of the army of the unemployed. [Laughter.] I request as a part of my remarks that his address to the American people be published in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

The resolutions referred to are as follows:

NATIONAL CONVENTION OF THE UNEMPLOYED—RESOLUTIONS.

DRUIDS' HALL, St. Louis, Mo., February 8, 1908.

To the President, Congress, State legislatures, and people of the United States:

Whereas the United States Treasury advanced $25,000,000 to the banks for their relief in the late financial panic; and

Whereas there are millions of people out of employment in the towns, cities, and villages of our land; and

Whereas, in a Government established for the express purpose of allowing people to enjoy "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," we have in certain places been denied the constitutional rights of assemblage, free speech, petition, and remonstrance, and have found it impossible thus far to secure municipal or State relief; and

Whereas on this account multitudes can barely exist, many are slowly dying for want of nourishment and proper shelter, and others are driven to desperation and crime, through no fault of their own; and

Whereas the working class, even when employed, do not receive the full product of their labor, but often only enough for the bare necessaries of life, and in an industrial panic are wholly unable to procure these things; and

Whereas, in brief, we believe you will recognize at once the existence of these conditions now that they are brought to your attention: Therefore,

The national committee of the unemployed, representing the cities in which the need is most acute, most urgently calls for suitable measures for the relief of the unemployed in this time of their distress.

We demand adequate measures whereby citizens of both sexes shall be insured against enforced idleness, and suggest that this may be done even in the same way as the soldiers are supported in periods of inactivity or upon being invalidated—that the soldiers of industry be treated at least as well as the soldiers of war. And, further, that in view of the fact that the fundamental cause of enforced unemployment lies in the inaccessibility of the machines, mills, and land to all the workers, we demand that sufficient of such land as remains in the public domain be now effectively put at the disposal of the unemployed for colonization or settlement, with such provision of implements and necessaries as shall enable them to harvest the first crop.

We suggest also that in towns and cities idle lands suitable for cultivation may be put at the disposal of the unemployed immediately, with similar provision; and

Whereas every year in the United States about 100,000 men are arrested under the present vagrancy laws for no other crime than being without work and without homes,

We demand of the State and local governments the modification of the vagrancy laws so that in all cases where vagrants shall be sentenced to labor in jails or other buildings used for penal purposes, or upon the public streets or highways, said vagrants shall be entitled to a credit of 50 cents each for every day's imprisonment, said sum to be paid to them in cash upon their release; and

Whereas from time to time there are industrial opportunities in one place and another, and these are inaccessible on account of the urgent need of transportation,

We demand that the Federal Government furnish transportation in such cases from one place to another, but in a way not to interfere with the workers anywhere in their efforts to better their condition.

As further measures of relief, we suggest any or all of the following as may be found adequate:

1. That Congress issue and appropriate $150,000,000, or as much as shall be necessary, to improve and deepen the waterways of the entire country, and especially those of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, by means of which enterprises employment shall be furnished to the unemployed.

2. That Congress make ample provision and appropriation for a system of national highways and better rural free-delivery routes, and that these enterprises also be made to furnish employment to the unemployed.

3. The enactment into law of the so-called Coxey noninterest-bearing bond bill, an act to provide for public improvements and for the employment of the citizens of the United States whereby towns, counties, cities, or States desiring to make public improvements and give employment to those unemployed may deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States a noninterest-bearing twenty-five year bond, said bond to be retired at the rate of 4 per cent of the principal per annum; and that against this bond the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States shall cause to be engraved and printed Treasury notes in the denomination of one, two, five, ten, and fifty dollars each, which shall be a full legal tender for all debts, public and private, to the full face value of said bond, and deliver in return for it 99 per cent of said notes, retaining 1 per cent for the expense of taking care of this department.

And in order that in future the victims of enforced idleness, together with the whole people, may be able, by direct legislation, to enact such remedial or corrective measures as they may deem adequate, we call for the establishment of the system of initiative and referendum in municipality, State, and nation.

We further recommend that, in all towns and cities where the unemployed exist in numbers, they assemble in a body on the morning of Sunday, February 16 next, march to the most prominent church or churches, and attend the services, making request of the pastor that he read from his pulpit on that occasion a copy of these resolutions to the President, Congress, and people of the United States.

We call the attention of the President, Congress, legislatures, and people to the fact that the only complete, permanent and final solution of the problem of poverty and enforced unemployment is a cooperative commonwealth.

And, finally, we urge the immediate enactment into law, State and national, of the remedial measures herein set forth, to the end that they may restore industrial opportunity to all the people and prevent degradation and crime.

National Committee of the Unemployed.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman moves the previous question, I desire him to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. CURRIER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I desire to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire, if he moves the previous question now, is it not true that there will be no amendment excepting the one to reduce this force to ten.

Mr. CURRIER. That is true; but if anybody desires to present a further amendment, an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, I will withhold the request for the previous question until that can be done; and let me say that if this House thinks that the three upper floors should not have any police protection, an amendment making the number fifteen, instead of ten, would take care of the doors as they are at present, leaving the three upper floors without police protection.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. That is what I want to do.

Mr. CURRIER. I yield if the gentleman desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi to strike out the word "ten" and substitute the word "fifteen."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman from Georgia that that would be an amendment in the third degree, unless the gentleman from Mississippi withdraws his amendment and allows the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia to be made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I can not consent to withdraw the amendment, because I think the number ten is amply sufficient.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, is as far as amendments can proceed.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Then, Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the original proposition, to strike out "twenty-one" and insert "fifteen."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia moves as a substitute to the resolution an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "twenty-one" and insert "fifteen."

Mr. CURRIER. Now, on the resolution and the amendments thereto I move the previous question.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first amendment offered by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 6, strike out "three" and insert "two," so as to read "two lieutenants."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the second committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 7, strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty-one."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi will be next in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "twenty-one" and insert "ten."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi. The amendment of the gentleman from Georgia will come after that.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, does not the substitute come before the amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, as reported by the Clerk.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS), there were—ayes 75, noes 90.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 99, nays 118, answering "present" 3, not voting 169, as follows:

For the balance of the day:

Mr. DOUGLAS with Mr. STEPHENS of Texas.

Mr. GILHAMS with Mr. GARRETT.

The result of the vote was then announced, as recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CURRIER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

TRACKAGE BILL.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 902.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. MANN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate bill 902. There is pending before the committee, as the Chair remembers, an amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama to section 16, which the Clerk will again report, without objection, for the information of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 18, in line 16, after the word "passage," strike out the words "in one general direction."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I desire to repeat what I said last night. I hope this amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, if it is in order, I would like to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order, if the amendment is germane.

Mr. HARDY. I move, then, to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, by striking out the words "in one direction" and inserting in lieu thereof "provided the same point shall be passed but once." To make a plain statement of the matter, the criticism of the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama was that it would enable street car passengers to ride all over the town and all day long, continuously in a circuit, on one fare.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will please state his amendment, so that it can be reported from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HARDY. Strike out the words "in one general direction," and insert in lieu thereof "provided the same point shall be passed but once."

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "in one general direction" and insert "provided the same point shall be passed but once."

Mr. HARDY. That would enable passengers to go, as they do now, in different general directions, and to leave one track wherever it intersected another track, and to take the other track in order to reach the desired destination. I take it as this bill reads now, a citizen could not get on a car on Fourteenth street and go down to the Treasury Building and then turn back and go to the northwestern portion of the district; neither could he get on a car at Q street and go down Ninth street, then go west on the avenue to Georgetown. I understand the purpose to be to enable passengers to have transfers so as to take as many different connecting lines as desired. I believe that under the bill, as it is framed now, street car companies could refuse to issue transfers in many cases where they do now issue them. In other words, I think you might ride less for one fare under the law as it is provided here than you can do under the system now in operation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Texas that under the rules of the House his amendment at this time is not in order. An amendment to strike out is pending now. If the motion to strike out is defeated, then it will be in order to move to strike out and insert.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to know what has become of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I would ask that the section be reported again with the proposed amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the section and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas now offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, lines 16 and 17, strike out the words, "in one general direction" and insert in lieu thereof "provided the same point shall be passed but once."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to say that while the committee does not think its bill is perfect, they have given this matter considerable consideration, and believe that this amendment ought not to prevail, and I hope it will not.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That every street railroad company or corporation owning, controlling, leasing, or operating one or more street railroads within the District of Columbia shall on each and all of its railroads supply and operate such number of cars, clean, sanitary, in good repair, with proper and safe power, equipment, appliances, and service, comfortable and convenient, and so operate the same as to give expeditious passage, not to exceed 15 miles per hour, to all persons desirous of the use of said cars, without crowding said cars or the platforms thereof. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby given power to require and compel obedience to all of the provisions of this section, and to make, alter, amend, and enforce all needful rules and regulations to secure said obedience; and said Commissioners are given power to make all such orders and regulations necessary to the exercise of the powers herein granted to them as may be reasonable and proper; and such railroad companies or corporations, their officers and employees, are hereby required to obey all the provisions of this section and such regulations and orders as may be made by said Commissioners. Any such company or corporation, or its officers or employees, violating any provision of this section, or any of the said orders or regulations made by the Commissioners, or permitting such violation, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000. And each day of failure or neglect on the part of such company or corporation, its officers or employees, to obey each and all of the provisions and requirements of this section, or the orders and regulations of the Commissioners made thereunder, shall be regarded as a separate offense.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer to that section.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 18 and to insert in lieu thereof the section which the Clerk has at the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa gave notice yesterday that he would offer this amendment at this time. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama, and he will have an opportunity to offer his amendment. The Clerk will now report the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 18 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 18. That every street railroad company operating one or more railroads within the District of Columbia shall on each and all of its railroads supply and operate such number of cars as will give comfortable, convenient, and expeditious passage to all persons desirous of the use of said cars. All such cars shall be clean, in good repair, and in good sanitary condition, and shall be supplied and operated with such frequency as to prevent crowding of either car or platform. It is hereby made the special duty of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to require and compel obedience to all of the provisions of this section, and to this end said Commissioners shall have authority to make and enforce all needful rules and regulations to secure obedience to the requirements herein contained, and to make such changes in the time cards or time schedules adopted by any railroad company, or to make such orders relating to the character and condition of the cars operated, or the time, manner, or frequency of their operations, as to said Commissioners may seem proper; and such railroad companies, their officers and employees, are hereby required to obey all of the provisions of this section, and such regulations and orders as may be lawfully made under its provisions. Any railroad company herein referred to, or its officers or employees, violating any provision of this section, or any of the orders or regulations made by the Commissioners by authority of the same, or permitting such violation, shall be punished, in the case of a railroad company by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, and in the case of an officer or employee of a railroad company by a fine not exceeding $100, or imprisonment not exceeding thirty days, or by both such fine and imprisonment. And each day of failure or neglect on the part of any railroad company, its officers or employees, to obey each and all of the provisions and requirements of this section, or the orders and regulations of the Commissioners issued thereunder, shall be regarded as a separate offense. Prosecutions under this section shall be in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, upon which jurisdiction is hereby conferred to try and determine the same. Such prosecutions shall be conducted by the corporation counsel or his assistant, who shall be entitled to a fee of not to exceed $25, to be fixed by the court, which fee shall be taxed as costs against the party failing in the suit."

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa is a substitute for the section. The gentleman from Alabama has a right to offer an amendment to perfect the original section first. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting in line 14, page 20, after the word "thereof" the following:

"And shall provide equal but separate accommodations for the white and colored races by providing two or more cars, or by dividing their cars by a partition or adjustable screen, which may be made movable, so as to allow adjustment of the space in the car in the manner suited to the requirements of the traffic, so as to secure separate accommodations for the white and colored races. No person shall be permitted to occupy seats in cars or compartments other than the ones assigned to them on account of the race to which they belong."

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, the adoption of my amendment will redound to the good of both races in the District of Columbia. It will remove the unpleasant friction that you now observe every day on the street cars in this city. You read in the newspapers almost every day of high crimes and misdemeanors committed in Washington. There are frequent disturbances on the street cars of this city between white and negro passengers, and they have become so common that newspapers rarely ever refer to them now. These disturbances occur because you herd negroes and white passengers in the same car. You will see negro men occupying seats in the car and women of the white race standing in the aisle holding on to straps. A negro woman comes into the car and the negro man gives her his seat, but he does not offer to vacate for the white woman. Let us be frank and deal with this question fairly and honestly. No white man, I care not what, for policy's sake, his protestations to the contrary may be, is pleased to see the women of his own race forced to stand in the cars while negro men occupy the seats. This, however, is the offensive and irritating condition that confronts him every day in Washington.

If, under the present street car management, conditions exist that annoy and cause bad feeling between the races, is it not the part of wisdom for us by proper legislation to relieve the situation by removing the cause?

Provide separate cars or separate compartments, and you remove the cause of complaint.

This is not a political question or a question to be theorized about. It is a racial fact that we are dealing with, and why not have the courage to acknowledge it? The truthful white man will tell you that he prefers to ride in a car with his own race separate and distinct from the negro race. The white people are in the majority in the city of Washington, and it is safe to say that if they could vote on my amendment, its adoption would be an absolute certainty. [Applause on the Democratic side and in the galleries.]

If you believe in majority rule and in the principles of local self-government—why don't you let the majority of the people have what they want—separate street cars or compartments in the cars in Washington? If for the good of both races and in the interest of peace and harmony between the races, the law says to the street car companies you shall provide suitable cars with equal accommodations for white and negro passengers, one of these compartments or cars shall be kept and operated solely for the passengers of the white race, and the other solely for the passengers of the negro race, who could or would complain? And tell me wherein, if you please, the negro is discriminated against any more than the white man? Adopt my amendment, gentlemen, and all the white people of this District will indorse your action. The good women will rejoice and praise you for having the courage and the manhood to put an end to the disgusting and disgraceful conditions now observed in the crowded cars of this city, and the negroes themselves would soon see the wisdom and feel the good of this legislation, and they, too, those of them who care for peace and good feeling between the races, would be pleased with the plan.

Since I introduced a bill in this House providing for separate street cars I have received many letters from men and women indorsing the bill and expressing the hope that it would become a law. I have been told time and again about negroes crowding into the cars, forcing themselves up against ladies standing in the aisles, and of white and negro passengers coming to blows because the white man resented the indignity offered; and sometimes the trouble arose over what the negro claimed was an indignity offered women of his race. One man, a splendid citizen and a reputable physician in this city, told me that while he and his wife were on a car one night, the only passengers for some distance, that a crowd of negro men and women who had been drinking got on the car, and that the loud talking and laughing was very annoying—that one of the negro women deliberately came down to where his wife was sitting by him at the rear of the car and sat down in his wife's lap, to the great amusement of the other negroes. He said that he resented the insult by striking the negro woman, and that the negro men rushed on him, and but for the interference of the conductor and a pocket knife which he, the doctor, drew, he would have been brutally assaulted. Adopt my amendment and occurrences like this will be no more.

You have no right to permit a condition to exist on the cars in this city which irritates and annoys a very large per cent of the traveling public. You have no right to permit a condition to exist on the street cars which is distasteful and offensive to a large per cent of those who ride on the cars in this District. A white man, a citizen of Washington, said to me last summer: "I trust that your bill for separate cars will pass. The present plan of operating the cars here is awful. We want separate cars. Time was when the white people of Washington who could not afford carriages and automobiles would take car rides for pleasure. In the very hot weather whole families would go out for a ride at night to get a breath of air. We have practically abandoned these rides on account of having to ride in crowded cars with negroes. If you will give us separate cars, you will confer a great blessing on thousands of white workers in the District of Columbia."

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] says that he expects Members on this side of the House who have colored voters in their district to rise to oppose this amendment. But I rise to oppose it, not merely in behalf of the few colored voters in my district, but in behalf of all the people there, whatever their race or their party affiliations. I protest against it as un-American, as unworthy of our twentieth-century civilization. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] insists that he airs no prejudices in urging the amendment. No prejudice prompts me to oppose it. I recognize the problem that exists in many of the States of the Union. I concede the right to the people of each of these States to solve the problem for themselves. I may differ with them as to the wisdom of their solution—as to whether they select the best solution. But no State problem is involved here. This is the National Government legislating for the capital city of the nation. In this House we represent 80,000,000 of sovereign American people, and we are legislating for 300,000 sovereign American people. And I, for one, would consider myself recreant to my constituents if I did not oppose the enactment of a law which would divide the people of Washington when they go to take a street car into two classes.

This is Washington's Birthday, a holiday observed by State and nation in honor of the memory of the great father of his country. He founded the nation. To him more than to any other one man is due the adoption of the Constitution by the people of the United States. The first purpose of that Constitution, as appears from its preamble, was to secure a more perfect union of the American people. And to-day, after nearly a century and a quarter of national life under the Constitution, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] would have us observe this day by proclaiming to the world by solemn enactment that the American people residing in this city are composed of two classes who must be kept separate when they ride in street cars. We might at least choose some other day on which to confess that in order to secure harmony and contentment in the national capital of the great Republic it is necessary to enact a law that will enable the white people to ride in their car and compel the colored people to ride in theirs.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I yield willingly to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why does not the gentleman word it the other way, and say permit them to ride in their cars and compel us to ride in ours? [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind the galleries that they are not allowed to make demonstration by applause or otherwise. If it is repeated, the Chair will enforce the rule.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. No matter which expression you use the purpose of this proposed legislation is perfectly plain to all. Gentlemen may use soft phrases and declare that in urging the amendment they have no prejudices against the negro. The fact, however, remains that no colored citizen of Washington desires any such legislation as is here proposed.

Mr. GRIGGS. Will my friend from Vermont yield to me?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I gladly yield to my friend, the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. GRIGGS. My friend from Vermont has referred to the fact that this is Washington's Birthday. I want to ask him if he does not think that if Washington himself were here he would vote for this amendment?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, most emphatically no. [Applause.] Washington was an American. [Applause.] No man ever lived who was more thoroughly imbued with the spirit of our American union, with the spirit of our institutions, with the spirit of our American life. This is the message he would bring to us: "Legislate not for whites or blacks, not for Democrats or Republicans, not for Protestants or Catholics, but for Americans."

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I yield to my friend, the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman from Vermont says he does not want to interfere with Alabama. If we have solved this part of the racial problem in Alabama, and it works well, does not the gentleman from Vermont think it would be wise to adopt that solution in the District of Columbia?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I am not prepared to admit the premises of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to say to the gentleman that such is the case in Alabama on the cars, and we never have any friction between the races now.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I am not here to discuss conditions in Alabama. As I indicated before, I concede to that State the right to solve its own problems. But so long as I remain a Member of this House I will not submit, without a protest, to the enactment of a law that recognizes the existence of classes among the people of our country. Liberty under law, law enlightened by liberty, has been the watchword of the American people. This means, on the one hand, liberty resting upon organized institutions through which the humblest as well as the mightiest may enjoy the fullest opportunity for growth and development. It means, on the other, the enactment of wise laws, laws embodying the enlightened sentiment of modern civilization, and then the enforcement of those laws alike against the mightiest and the humblest. Liberty under law, law enlightened by liberty, these twin principles lie at the foundation of our Government. They permeate all our institutions. Generation after generation, with its struggles, its achievements, its failures, returns to dust. But these remain, for they are as everlasting as the throne of God itself. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] inserted in line 14, page 20, after the word "thereof," containing the following language:

> And shall provide equal but separate accommodations for the white and colored races by providing two or more cars or by dividing their cars by a partition or adjustable screen which may be made movable, so as to allow adjustment of the space in the car in the manner suited to the requirements of the traffic, so as to secure separate accommodations for the white and colored races. No person shall be permitted to occupy seats in cars or compartments other than the ones assigned to them on account of the race to which they belong—impresses me with the belief that he mistakes this body for the State legislature of Alabama. The legislation which he proposes is purely of a character such as we might expect to be asked to enact by a gentleman coming from the part of the country the gentleman in part represents. It is evident that he forgets that this body represents the people of the United States. It does not represent the policy of the State from which the gentleman comes, nor the policy inaugurated by any other State in the Union. We are here to legislate for the people of the nation as a whole, and not for or against any section or inhabitant thereof.

The abhorrent, inhuman, and unjustifiable, as well as unconstitutional, Jim Crow law may meet with the approval of the gentleman's constituents who are allowed to vote, but it does not meet with either the approval or the sympathy of any fair-minded, thinking man of any class in sections of the country where absolute freedom of action is allowed to prevail, and I protest as the Representative of a district where no discrimination is allowed, a district in which every American, regardless of color, creed, race, or previous condition of servitude, is allowed to exercise his right of citizenship without any attempt at abridgment whatsoever. The people living in the State which I have the honor in part to represent believe that the Constitution means what it says when it guarantees to every citizen, without regard to his color or previous condition of servitude, the God-given right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. The people that I represent believe that the liberty guaranteed by the Constitution was intended for all the people and not for one class, and that it means just what it says; and when any class of people of any section of the country seek to arrogate to themselves the sole right to the exercise of that liberty, to the exclusion of all other classes, that the Government should then intervene and protect the one and restrain the other. And if there is no law under which the Government can intervene for that purpose, it is the sworn duty of the Congress of the United States to enact a law such as will give to the Government the power so to do.

The amendment offered by the gentleman to the pending bill is un-American. It is unjustifiable. It is unjust. It is discriminatory. It is indefensible. It is lamentable, and this House will not, I am sure, permit it to be enacted into law. This is the nation's capital. We would be derelict in the performance of our duty as representatives of a free people if we permitted the perpetration of such an outrage upon a liberty-loving and God-fearing people.

The State from which the gentleman comes has trampled on the rights of a race weakened by years of inhuman servitude—a race broken in spirit by the yoke of serfdom. Laws have been enacted by its legislature preventing these citizens from exercising the rights guaranteed to them by the Constitution, and doubtless methods of intimidation have been practiced which, added to the burdens of unjust laws, would, if exposed to public view, make a record of oppression which would bring a blush of shame to the face of every believer in law and justice the country over; and now the gentleman from Alabama, under the false cry of social equality, seeks to insert in this bill a provision which he, as a lawyer, knows to be unconstitutional, in order that he may receive the applause of a haughty, austere, and egotistical aristocracy, who are laboring under the false impression that they are the first and the foremost people on earth. That the amendment offered by the gentleman is discriminatory in its nature he can not truthfully deny—that the purpose of its introduction is to still further humiliate that class of our citizens who have been and are being prevented from the exercise of their rights in the section of the country from which the gentleman has the honor to come.

He continues to manifest a disposition to crush them beneath the iron heel of tyranny, and never misses an opportunity to express his views upon the question whenever he feels that he can add anything to their suffering and humiliation.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Not yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MADDEN. I protest against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] because it discriminates as between American citizens.

Mr. GRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GRIGGS. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if he remembers the shotgun quarantine established once in Illinois by one of its governors, a Republican governor, against this particular race. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MADDEN. Whether I remember it or not, I have never conceded the right of any man, whether he was the governor of Illinois or of any other State, whether he was a Member of Congress from Alabama or from Georgia, to inaugurate any policy in violation of the law of the State or of the nation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman who was governor of Illinois at the time referred to by the gentleman from Georgia has been dead for many years. He is lying peacefully in his grave in the capital of the State which gave him birth. He fought valiantly in defense of his country at the time when patriots shed their blood for the abolishment of the iniquitous system which kept human beings in bondage, and he was the only governor in the Union who mustered in a full regiment of colored men commanded by colored officers, which regiment performed heroic service on the battlefields of Cuba in our war with Spain. What he did or did not do on the occasion referred to by the gentleman is not a subject with which I am familiar. I believe now, as I have always believed, that every American citizen, whether he be black or white, has the unquestioned right to pass from one State to another, to seek employment, to exercise his rights of citizenship, to engage in any legitimate employment, and be protected in his right to work or not to work so long as he does not violate the law. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GRIGGS. The gentleman does not deny the fact indicated by my question that Governor Tanner, a Republican governor, did establish a shotgun quarantine against the "nigger?"

Mr. MADDEN. I have no personal knowledge of what the governor of Illinois did except what I saw at the time in the public press.

If the governor established a shotgun quarantine he did that which the law did not give him the right to do, for, as I have previously said, usurpation, by whomsoever exercised, should not be tolerated and will not be tolerated in this free land of ours.

In conversation with the governor, subsequent to the time referred to by the gentleman from Georgia, I remonstrated with him for the action which the public press attributed to him at the time in question.

I say now, as I have said before, that no governor of any State has the right to discriminate in favor of or against any class of American citizens. He is elected to execute the law impartially.

This is, let me repeat, the American Congress legislating for the American people, and we are bound under oath to so legislate for the people that every citizen, black and white, will be treated in strict accordance with the laws of the land. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GRIGGS. I would like to ask the gentleman if his remonstrance availed anything with the governor?

Mr. MADDEN. Whether the remonstrance amounted to anything or not or whether I remonstrated with the governor at all has nothing to do with the question before the House. I was in favor then, and I am in favor now, of protecting every citizen in his right to the exercise of the liberty granted him by the Constitution, and the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Alabama may roar and vociferate to their hearts' content, but they can not get away from the undisputed fact that we are here to legislate for the people of the whole country, irrespective of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. My friend says that he is opposed to any law that discriminates against either race. I would like to ask him, in his opinion, which race is discriminated against in this amendment. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MADDEN. The question of the gentleman is a reflection upon my intelligence, because any man possessed with enough sense to charge the skull of a sandhill crane knows that the amendment does seek to discriminate against the colored race, whether it be couched in language which will stand the test of the supreme court of the State of Alabama to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GRIGGS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? There is no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I want to suggest to the gentleman that this amendment provides that there shall be equal and separate accommodation for the races. In other words, that the white race shall not ride with the negroes in the cars, and that the negroes shall not ride in the same compartment with the whites. I ask the gentleman, therefore, which race, in his opinion, is here discriminated against.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Mississippi knows from his experience in his own State that there is no attempt made to give equal accommodations to the races; that they are segregated by force of law, and they are compelled to use such accommodations as are afforded them, regardless of whether they are equal accommodations or not. They have no voice in the matter. The authorities in the States of Mississippi and Alabama and other like States dictate the terms upon which they shall ride and the character of the accommodations to be afforded them. They have no voice in electing the officials; they are disfranchised; they are prevented from participating in the affairs of their States; they occupy practically the same position of servitude that they were compelled to occupy prior to their liberation by force of arms.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield for just one other question? The membership of this House is very largely Republican. I will call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that parties are admitted to the galleries of this House by card and gentlemen on that side have a great many more cards to admit people to the galleries than on this side, and I will call his attention to the fact that in the card galleries to-day, which are full, they are all white and no negroes.

Mr. MADDEN. Each Member has equal rights to issue cards to the galleries. Democracy or Republicanism does not enter into the question of the right of Members to issue cards, and the gentleman from Mississippi knows it. He knows that he has equal power to issue cards with every other Member of Congress, whether he be a Democrat or a Republican. He knows that there is no limit placed on the right of Members of Congress to issue cards to the galleries, and that cards signed by him will be honored by the doorkeepers of the galleries just as promptly as the cards signed by the most prominent Republican Member on the floor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GRIGGS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. GRIGGS. The gentleman recognizes he also has power to issue as many cards as the gentleman from Mississippi. Has he ever issued any in that gallery to a negro?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes [applause on the Republican side]; and he not only has done so, but he will be glad to do so again if one applies to him for admission.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, delighted.

Mr. CLAYTON. In regard to the question of discrimination. Does not the gentleman know that the courts, State and Federal, have uniformly upheld these separate-coach laws as being no discrimination against anybody? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MADDEN. We are legislating for the nation, and the gentleman speaks of State laws enacted by legislatures of particular States.

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, this law falls in the same category as a State law. The gentleman, I am sure, has enough legal perception to admit that.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman has enough legal perception to know that legislation such as is proposed in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama would not stand the test in the Supreme Court of the United States.

And now, Mr. Chairman, in the language of an honored ex-Speaker of this House, I plead for the sacredness of the Constitution and for the enforcement of all its provisions; for that first written charter of national freedom, born amid the throes of kingdoms and empires, to plant, preserve, and perpetuate civil and religious liberty in the world and designed as a shield for the oppressed and persecuted. It came only after the flames had died out in the crater of a war waged for the equality of man before the law; its price was the blood and treasure of the patriots of the Revolution. It is also the more sacred by reason of the blood spilled and treasure expended in more recent wars for humanity to save it; equality of rights was its central principle. It was made by and for the people. Its preamble reads:

> We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

A perfect union can not be formed nor justice established, domestic tranquillity insured, common defense provided for, general welfare promoted, and the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity secured by establishing and maintaining an inequality in political power by allowing a few in one State, regardless of conditions or methods, to exercise the elective franchise given to the many in other States of the Union. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama would lead the House to believe that there is a riot on the street cars here in Washington every day in the year because the colored people and the white people of the District ride in the same cars. Now, I have been riding from time to time in the street cars here for five years, and I have yet to see the first disturbance of any character. I have yet to see the first offensive action on the part of any colored man toward a white man and I have yet to see the first offensive action on the part of a white man toward a colored man. It may be a friction and cause for riot, in the mind of the gentleman from Alabama, for colored men to come into his presence, but there are many of us who do not feel that way and do not take that attitude toward the negro.

The people of the District of Columbia are legislated for by the American Congress, and Congress ought to adhere to the Constitution of the United States in the enactment of every law that goes out of this body, and that great charter knows no distinction between the white man and the black man.

I should regard it as an evil day when the American Congress would create in this nation a class distinction by the enactment of any law. The political rights of the American people are the same—white or black—and they should ever remain so. All men are and of right ought to be equal under the law, and this nation must never enact a law in violation of that fundamental right of every citizen of the Republic, and States that violate that right will some day suffer the penalty that is visited upon those who perpetrate wrong and do injustice.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] says—and he was shaking his finger at this side of the House—that there are men here who will vote against this amendment because there are colored men in their districts who have a vote. It ought to be a matter of shame to the gentleman from Alabama and to his party that there are thousands of colored men in his State and in the whole South who have been denied the right to cast a vote. [Applause on the Republican side.] I glory in the fact that the State I have, in part, the honor to represent here guarantees to every citizen within its confines the right to exercise the franchise of a citizen under the Constitution of the United States and under the laws of that State. One man, under the Constitution, is as good as any other man while he behaves himself. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] would, instead of allaying the friction of which he speaks in the District of Columbia and in the United States, inaugurate an era of friction here and elsewhere in the country. The people of this country do not all think upon the question of the races as the people of Alabama and the people of Georgia seem to think upon that question. A large majority believe in the equality of all men before the law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama may not be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I move that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The gentleman states that no distinction is made in Kansas between anybody, white or black, I have in my hand a dispatch from Wichita, Kans., which says:

> Wichita hotels refused admittance to Booker T. Washington, who lectured here to-night. When Washington's manager sought to engage quarters for him at the leading hotel of the city he was informed that colored people were not entertained there. Washington was compelled to accept the hospitality of a friend here.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. That hotel proprietor acted without the authority of any ordinance of the city of Wichita or any law of the State of Kansas, and against the fundamental law of the State and nation.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. But permit me to say——

Mr. CAMPBELL. He acted in fact in violation of the law, and in all probability, if Booker Washington had the time this hotel keeper would be the defendant in an action for damages. The probabilities are that the man was a Democrat from Georgia who was running the hotel. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. A Democrat from Alabama or Georgia does not go to Kansas very often.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It would do them good to go there, and they would soon learn that all men are equal before the law.

Mr. BURLESON. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that in some parts of Kansas the local authorities, under authority of the State law, provided separate schools for the races?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURLESON. Is that discrimination?

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is. That is a discrimination that ought never to have been made.

Mr. GRIGGS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. GRIGGS. Has this hotel proprietor who unlawfully refused accommodations to Booker Washington ever been punished or prosecuted or lost his license?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Not having any information on the question I could not answer the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. GRIGGS. Is there only one hotel in Wichita?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, there are many hotels there.

Mr. GRIGGS. And the gentleman says that the leading hotel is a Democratic hotel?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Indeed, I do not know. I did not say so.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the gentleman believe in white children and negroes going to the same school?

Mr. CAMPBELL. My children go to the same school that the colored children in my ward go to in the city of Pittsburg, Kans.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the gentleman believe in that?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do, or I would not send my children there.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the gentleman believe in their worshiping in the same church?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I was in the same church with colored people last Sunday morning, in this city, and in one of the most fashionable churches in Washington. Their presence did not detract from the service as a means of grace.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the gentleman believe in marriage between the races?

Mr. CAMPBELL. No, sir; any more than the gentleman from Alabama; and there is a vast difference between social equality and political equality. [Applause on the Republican side.] I would not permit my daughter to marry some white men. [Applause.]

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Would you permit her to marry any colored man?

Mr. CAMPBELL. No, sir; I would not do that any more than you would do it. But I would permit the colored man to exercise political rights under the Constitution by my side. [Renewed applause.]

Mr. HARDY. Do you believe that the schools are political rights?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I believe the right to attend school and the right to ride upon street cars as a citizen is a political right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired. [Applause.]

[Mr. CLARK of Florida addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SIMS. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I can not say, as the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER] said, that there are few colored voters in my district. It was interesting for me to hear that remark, because I know how exactly that was like the conditions in the State of Alabama, where also there are few colored voters. I heard from one of the gentleman's constituents a story of what happened when the State of Alabama had passed a law predicated, I think, on the educational test that existed in Massachusetts. The governor of Alabama had appointed commissioners to find out whether the voters in the different precincts were capable of passing the educational test and so were eligible to the franchise. There was one particular colored man in this part of the State of Alabama, a man of remarkable intelligence, a man of standing in the community, an owner of property, who unfortunately was especially influential with the other colored men less favored than he. Of course the examination in reading and writing went by without any trouble, but then the commissioners started to ask him questions upon the Constitution of the United States. They found he knew materially more about that than possibly his inquisitor. Finally, realizing that there must be some way in which they could eliminate the possibility of this man's influential vote being cast, they said:

> Sam, what do you know about the writ of habeas corpus?

Sam looked at his inquisitor and half smiled and half cried, and he said:

> The writ of habeas corpus means you don't want this nigger to vote.

[Laughter.]

Now, gentlemen, you may laugh at that, but it is a tragedy, and I know that the thing was true, because it was told to me by the Alabama Democrat who himself was the inquisitor.

Now, this "Jim Crow" car proposition—does it not seem rather ridiculous to get up and say that it is not a discrimination? I have been south of Mason and Dixon's line a great many times. I have seen the cars to which the colored people are sent. I have seen the cars in which the white people traveled, and there is not one of you who will get up and say that they are in the slightest degree equal. Suppose the Supreme Court did say this separation of passengers was not a discrimination. They are not carrying out the law as you have put it on the statute books.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. OLCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am pretty sure the gentleman has traveled in the State of Florida?

Mr. OLCOTT. I have on one occasion only, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman say that he has ever traveled upon a railroad train in the State of Florida where the passenger coach occupied by blacks was not of exactly the same character in its appointments and just as good as the coach occupied by white people?

Mr. OLCOTT. I can not answer specifically about the State of Florida, because I do not remember.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Let me say to the gentleman that he will find in that State that the passenger coaches are just as good that are furnished to the black people as those that are furnished to the white people.

Mr. OLCOTT. I am very glad to hear it. I know and you all know it is not generally so.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. OLCOTT. I will not yield now.

Mr. BURLESON. But the gentleman asked us to deny.

Mr. OLCOTT. I know and you all know that in most places in the South the accommodations, whether in waiting rooms or in cars, that are given to the negroes, are not equal to those given to the whites.

Mr. HARDY rose.

Mr. OLCOTT. I will not yield now, but I will yield in a moment.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Or rather to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman from New York is stating that which is not a fact——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not stating a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the matter stated is something you deny in fact, have you not a right at that particular time to say so, whether the gentleman yields or not?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The parliamentary inquiry is so simple that it only requires the statement to show that it is not the case.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, they seem to be so fearful on the other side when I say "you know," that I will make the statement "I know." I have been in the South and have traveled there, and I know it is true.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to ask the gentleman——

Mr. OLCOTT. I will not yield now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York have five minutes more.

Mr. GRIGGS. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia objects and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the objection to the unanimous consent has been withdrawn by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. OLCOTT. When the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] was talking he was interrupted by questions as to the social equality of the colored people with the white people. The question as to who shall ride in a public conveyance is certainly not a question as to social equality. If an individual is offensive to other people and creates a disturbance, the proper thing to do is not to allow him to ride in a public conveyance at all, but to hand him over to the police to be properly dealt with.

The suggestion to add to this bill for the approaches to the Union Station a provision prohibiting a certain race of people from riding in the cars of the District is an absurdity. Not until we are ready to declare the emancipation of the slaves a mistake, not until we are ready to abandon the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution, not until we are ready to go back to the conditions that existed before the war, should such a suggestion receive serious consideration in this body. There is no reason for separating the whites and the blacks in public conveyances or places. In the district which I represent in the city of New York there are many thousands of colored people who are as peace loving and law-abiding and industrious as any class or race. They have the same right to use the public conveyances as the white people have, and disturbances or troubles do not come on account of their color. In New York City they use the public conveyances of every kind—the street cars, the elevated railways, and the subway trains. They worship with us in the same churches without any objection from anyone. Why the city of Washington should be treated differently from the city of New York or any other place where equal rights with the whites are given to the blacks is inconceivable to me.

You gentleman of the South have in one way or another practically prevented the colored man from voting, and you urge that the capital of this nation shall pass regulations relative to the right of the colored man to ride in the cars as one more step to his redegradation, and to that end you are trying to urge Congress to pass legislation which would not be tolerated by any fair-minded people in any locality except yours. The colored man has been guaranteed equal rights with the white man, and if they commit breaches of the peace they should be treated individually as others are. The Federal Government can not completely control what you do in the Southern States in regard to the treatment of the colored people, but we are in a position to insist that here in the city of Washington, or in any other place under Federal jurisdiction, as long as the Republican party is in control, the colored people shall have what is given to them by the Constitution and its amendments. The Republican party has always been a party of progress and construction rather than of retrogression and destruction, and never will this body, while the Republican party is in the majority, consent to such a preposterous measure as is suggested by this proposed amendment. The trouble is that you gentlemen on the other side say: "There is a bad white man, but there are good white men; there is a bad Chinaman, but there are good Chinamen; there is a bad Turk, but there are good Turks; there is a bad Greek, but there are good Greeks." But, on the other hand, you say and act that because one colored man is a disturber of the peace, therefore, there are no good or industrious colored men. The "Jim Crow" car has been an abomination wherever it has been adopted. It is the most insulting thing that has ever been suggested. It has added to disturbances rather than allayed them. Nothing has been so entirely resented as this action in the several communities where it has been adopted. It is unwise, intolerable, and grossly vicious.

I most earnestly hope that the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Alabama will not be agreed to.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT] may have five minutes more of the time of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not make that request unless the gentleman from Tennessee yields.

Mr. SIMS. I am going to yield, if gentlemen will give me an opportunity. So many Members are yielding for me that I can not get the opportunity to do so myself. I am trying to say this, before I yield to the gentleman from New York, as I want him to have as much time as he wants: This committee has been at work day in and day out and night in and night out to try and get a bill passed in order that the construction to the new station might begin. Here it is 3 o'clock and 15 minutes in the afternoon and we have a question up that we may debate from now until the end of this session and not change the mind of a gentleman on this side of the Chamber nor the mind of a gentleman on that side. [Applause.] Why not let us go along and pass this bill? I am for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, but I know it is utterly impossible to get it incorporated in this bill. Let us get the bill through, and some time in the future, in general debate, let us thrash the negro question out, even if we thrash each other while doing it. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT], but I want to give notice that I will move to close debate in fifteen minutes on this section and all amendments to same.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask whether this side of the House brought up this matter or the other side?

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SIMS. I yield all of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not yield his time.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to say anything on this amendment to the bill, but it seems to me there is a disposition on the other side of the aisle to try to play politics on this question. [Laughter on the Republican side.] You have not much else except the negro left, and you want to cling to him in spite of the Brownsville affair.

This discussion has been purposely broadened by the Republican Members of this House into a general discussion of the negro as a voter, with special reference to the policy of the South on that subject. It has been so broadened in the hope that the negro vote throughout the land, reported to be much dissatisfied with the conduct of the present Administration, will be not only mollified, but solidified under the Republican banner. It is also doubtless the hope, as it is surely the desire, of our opponents that some white voters in the North and West, principally theorists and uninformed but well-meaning enthusiasts on this subject, may be turned to the Republican candidate in the approaching election. That such a purpose should be entertained is, perhaps, only natural. That such an effort should be made is only usual.

Whenever the people of this country fully understand the hollowness of these Republican protestations and professions, the sincerity of that party will be entirely discredited. In its very last platform—that of 1904—the Republican party made this declaration:

> We favor such Congressional action as shall determine whether, by special discriminations, the elective franchise in any State has been unconstitutionally limited, and if such is the case we demand that representation in Congress and in the Electoral College shall be proportionally reduced, as directed by the Constitution of the United States.

An emptier, weaker, more inane pledge was never made in a party platform. If any State has "unconstitutionally limited the elective franchise," such action is invalid and void, and the unconstitutional statute must necessarily fall. Upon such a statute you could not successfully base a proposition to reduce representation in accordance with the provisions of the second section of the fourteenth amendment. Besides, if you were only to act in case "special discriminations" were made by "unconstitutional statutes," is not the determination of the constitutional question necessarily a judicial question and not a legislative one? What a ridiculous attitude Congress would assume if it should undertake to usurp the functions of the judicial branch of the Government and declare that the statutes of any State on any question were unconstitutional!

And yet this was the solemn, nay, farcical, declaration that your Chicago platform of 1904 made to the people. Recognizing, as I did, Mr. Chairman, that many of the brightest minds and keenest intellects in the country were at the Chicago convention and were guiding its proceedings, I entertained the suspicion then that has crystallized into certainty now—that the platform of the Republican party on this question was purposely obscure and was designedly muddy. I thought then, as I think now, that it was intended to please the negro delegates from the South, and, much more important, to solidify the negro vote in the doubtful States. It was the sirup to catch the flies with. Nothing more and nothing less.

Now, what happened after the convention? The election was won by the Republicans. That party elected its President and elected a large majority of both Houses of Congress.

Three and a half years have passed. During every single second of that time the Republican party has had complete power in every branch of the Government. What has it done to redeem this vague, uncertain, and indefinite pledge? Nothing; absolutely nothing. What "Congressional action" has it taken to determine "whether, by special discriminations, the elective franchise in any State has been unconstitutionally limited?" None; absolutely none.

What attention has it paid to the demand that "representation shall be reduced? None, absolutely none.

Mr. Chairman, why can not we be sincere with one another on this great question? Why do you continue to torment the South on this question? Do you wish to hold her in terrorism forever, simply to be able to shout, "Equal political rights for the negro" once every four years, so that you may rally a dusky host about your banners in every Presidential contest? Speaking for myself alone, but voicing, I believe, the sentiment of a vast majority of the white men and women of the South, I tell you frankly that if we could thereby secure the repeal of the fifteenth amendment, and settle the political phase of this negro question forever, I believe the South would be willing to part with a part of its representation on this floor and in the Electoral College. That the generous-minded people of the entire Union will ever demand such a pound of flesh, I do not for a moment believe. That they would have a right to do so, under the Federal Constitution, I emphatically deny. But if I am mistaken about the temper of the people, if I am mistaken about the constitutional question involved; if the sacrifice is to be demanded, and is to be sanctioned under forms of law, then, sir, I repeat, the South had far better make it than to continue forever with this sword of Damocles suspended over her head and chained to this body of death.

Let me say, further, that while the Republican party has enacted no legislation on this subject, as it never intended to, that the judicial door is open to any of the gentlemen, here or elsewhere, who complain so bitterly about these unconstitutional statutes. The States of the South contend, with full confidence in the merit of their contention, that under the suffrage laws of no one of them has "the elective franchise been unconstitutionally limited." So far as the courts have passed on these questions, in the cases of Williams v. Mississippi, of Giles v. Harris (Alabama), and of Jones v. Montague, Governor (Virginia), it has sustained our contention and upheld the State statutes. That the highest court in the land is bound to uphold the constitutionality of each of these statutes we firmly believe and confidently assert.

Why, then, because the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] proposes an amendment that undertakes to deal with a social question, all this clamor about the election laws of the South? Why long inaction, in the face of an absurd platform declaration, until just before another Presidential election?

The purpose is patent. The motives that prompt it are neither fair nor just to a great section of our common country that already has trouble enough, sir, on this negro question, and whose troubles no gentleman on this floor ought to be willing to augment in an effort to seek a partisan advantage.

The United States of America is now and always has been and always will be a white man's country. In my judgment a vast majority of its citizens will never consent to equality, either social or political, with the black man or the yellow man, the African or the Asiatic.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] who has just taken his seat, intimates that we are trying to play politics. I suppose he never played politics.

Mr. HARDWICK. Never.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I was told that when he was running for Congress the first time he made a platform of his own——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind the gentleman from New York that he can refer to Members of the House only in the third person.

Mr. HARDWICK. As far as I am concerned I waive that.

Mr. DRISCOLL. The gentleman waives it. I ask unanimous consent then to say that I was told that he made a platform in his district to the effect that if he got to Congress he would repeal the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I made no such platform. I said the fifteenth amendment and part of the fourteenth ought to be repealed, and they ought to be. I did not promise to do it, but if I had the power I would do it.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Oh, the gentleman is taking up my time.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman allow me to make one further statement?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman get me more time?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes. I want to say this to the gentleman from New York: I did promise to advocate the repeal of these amendments, and I have done my best on the subject, but I did not say that I could repeal the fifteenth amendment, but I wish to God I could. It was the mistake of the century, and you gentlemen have permitted it to become a dead letter. Your courts say the States of the South have not violated it, and you promise remedies you never seek to enforce for its alleged violation.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Oh, the gentleman can extend his remarks in the RECORD. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I want to protest against this amendment, and I want to protest especially against the prejudice or the sentiment which prompted it, not only to-day, which is the anniversary of the birth of the father of our country, but every other day in the year.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman allow me just one question?

Mr. DRISCOLL. I decline to yield. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], who proposes this amendment, says that this practice prevails in his part of the country, and that no friction occurs down there such as happens here in Washington. We read in the papers that friction does occur down there once in a while, such as hangings and burnings, and other sorts of executions, lynchings, and murders. Are they friction or are they not?

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DRISCOLL. I decline to yield for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. DRISCOLL. The gentleman who proposed this amendment and other gentlemen who come from the same section of the country have been for many years trying to do what the gentleman from Georgia says he would like to do. They have been trying to nullify the effect of the fourteenth and, especially, the fifteenth amendments. They have drafted constitutions for their several States and adopted them—some of them with "grandfathers' clauses"—and have made statutes regulating elections, and practically have disfranchised all of the colored people throughout that great part of the country.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled. The gentleman from New York will proceed.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Yes; the gentlemen are very strenuous at raising points of order when the truth is being told. On the record they claim they give the colored people the same chance that the whites have to vote, and they talk loud before the election committees and at other places that they make no discrimination; but they know and we know——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HARDWICK. I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended for five minutes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I only want two minutes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DRISCOLL. You have succeeded in subduing them and quieting them by force, and the people from the rest of the country have tolerated this. You have been permitted to do it by sufferance, and now you have become so bold and defiant as to have the assurance to come into the Congress of the nation and offer this amendment right here on the floor of the House. I wish we could get a yea-and-nay vote on this question.

Mr. BURLESON. I wish we could get a secret ballot on it.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I wish you will move to recommit the bill with this amendment and we will have a yea-and-nay vote on it. I will be glad to see how many will stand up and vote for it.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. We would be glad to give unanimous consent to a yea-and-nay vote for this side if it could be arranged to have a secret ballot upon this question on your side, and if this could be done, against this amendment there would not be five votes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DRISCOLL. We are not afraid to vote in the open upon this question.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Yes.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. You say you want a yea-and-nay vote. You can get it by passing this amendment by the committee and voting upon it in the House.

Mr. DRISCOLL. If your people will stand by you, you can get it by moving to recommit. You can do it, and I want to put you on record. I want to put some of the gentlemen over there on record.

Mr. HARDY. We are ready to go on record.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Down in Texas there are Democrats who will not go on record.

Mr. HARDY. Yes; we will go on record.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, a question. I come from the State of Ohio and my friend from the State of New York. My father fought four years to give these people freedom. He protests against the conduct of the President of the United States in denying them the privileges given to other soldiers of the United States. Now, with reference to the Brownsville affair, when three companies of colored troops were dishonorably discharged without trial or court-martial, are you willing to go on record on that?

Mr. DRISCOLL. What has that to do with this?

Mr. ANSBERRY. It is the same question.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I will go on record when it comes up regularly and in order.

Mr. Chairman, the change in the cars now owned by the railway companies operating in this city and the number of new ones required to comply with the terms and conditions of this proposed amendment would impose a very large and unnecessary burden on those companies. The money better be expended in other important and much-needed improvements.

But this is not my chief objection to it. "Jim Crow" cars are not necessary in order to avoid friction and irritation between blacks and whites, which is the main argument urged in its favor by the gentleman who proposed it. Many passengers are required to stand in the Washington cars, and there is much strap hanging. I have been here during four Congresses and always ride in the cars when I do not walk, and have never observed any indication of the friction here spoken of at length by the gentleman from Alabama. However, if there is any friction it is not the fault of our colored citizens. There is no law or ironclad rule of propriety requiring one passenger to surrender his seat to another. But it is the part of good manners for a man to yield his seat to a woman, and especially for a young and vigorous man to extend this courtesy to an elderly lady. This courtesy prevails more generally in this city than in other places where I have been in the country. The rule quite generally observed here is for white men to surrender their seats to white women who would otherwise be obliged to stand. In this regard they manifest much politeness. I have observed but very few instances where white men have given their seats to black women, while black men are quite prompt in extending this courtesy to white women. My notion is that this statement is borne out by the experience and observation of every man on the floor of this House—that in this particular bit of gallantry the advantage is decidedly in favor of the negroes.

I am persuaded that the friction of which the gentleman from Alabama complains consists in the fact that he must sit on the same seat or ride in the same compartment with negroes. That goes against the grain, and in that is the irritation.

Talk of friction. It strikes me there would be some real friction in the enforcement of this proposed law. In this city there are people of all shades of color, from pure-blooded Caucasians to pure-blooded Africans, and but very few of the latter class. There are mulattoes, quadroons, octoroons, and those of even lighter shades of African blood. There are people with blue eyes, light hair, and as white skinned as southern Europeans; and yet to the experienced ethnologist they may betray a strain of Ethiopian blood, and by an inexorable social law, established and enforced in the South, all people in whose veins flows the slightest strain of African blood are forced into the negro class. Those mixtures and amalgamations between the races bear witness of more intimate social relations between white men and black women than is possible by riding in the same cars or compartments through the streets of Washington, and that, too, when those women were slaves, the property of white owners, and had no alternative but to yield when their masters desired to possess them.

You say we do not and can not understand the race question as you do. We admit it. It is very difficult for us to appreciate your consistency in permitting such intimate social relations in some respects when you enforce ironclad social ostracism in others. Those mixed bloods are here. They are not to blame because their remote ancestors were brought to this country as slaves by your remote ancestors, nor are they responsible for their light coloring, produced by the unholy miscegenation by white planters.

This amendment was manifestly suggested by and is a modification of the Alabama statutes establishing "Jim Crow" cars in that State, and in the code of that State is the following definition of the term "negro:"

> The term "negro," within the meaning of this code, includes mulatto. The term "mulatto," or "person of color," within the meaning of this code is a person of mixed blood descended on the part of the father or mother from negro ancestors, to the third generation, inclusive, though one ancestor of each generation may have been a white person.

According to my construction of this definition, a man seven-eighths white may be a negro, and would be obliged to "herd" in the same compartment or car with blacks.

The gentlemen favoring this amendment, from observation and experience, may be able in all instances to detect racial differences, but conductors and motormen are not experts of the same experience and ability. This is a cosmopolitan city, where Hawaiians, Filipinos, East Indians, Cubans, Turks, and Armenians reside. Ambassadors, ministers, and consuls are here from South American and Asiatic nations with their retinues and servants. But few of them are as white as northern Europeans, who constitute the basis of our population. The rigid enforcement of this "Jim Crow" car amendment might lead to mistakes and international complications, and then there would be friction.

I make no pretensions as an expounder of the Federal Constitution, and yet I venture the opinion that this amendment is repugnant to that instrument. It provides that no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, and what States con not do certainly the National Government can not do. Negroes are citizens of the United States, and this proposed law would abridge their privileges and immunities.

Our street car companies were created by Congress and are governed and regulated by this body. They are public-service corporations and common carriers of passengers, and all people who pay the fare and behave themselves properly should be given equal consideration and the same kind of treatment, and there should be no discrimination against them. But the gentlemen who favor this amendment promptly inquire, Who can say that this is not discrimination against the whites and in favor of the blacks? Oh, Mr. Chairman, this is not open to argument. You make the same argument in defense of your constitutions, election laws, and regulations, and say that on their face they do not discriminate against negroes who are entitled to vote. But you know, and we know, and the whole country knows, that your constitutions and election laws and your social code and your "Jim Crow" cars are all designed and enforced for the purpose of discriminating against the blacks in order to make them feel at every turn that they are an inferior people and subject race, and that they must recognize this discrimination at every point where they meet with white people in the ordinary relations of life. There is only one interpretation which can be put upon this amendment, and that is that it discriminates against the colored people and humiliates and degrades them.

Have the colored people appealed or petitioned for this amendment? Have they demanded separate cars or separate compartments? No. Only white people from the South and their Representatives in Congress are urging the adoption of this amendment, and they demand it not because of any danger to be apprehended from the negroes, or because of irritation or friction, but because they do not want to ride side by side, or even in the same compartment, with their colored brethren. This amendment would mean another insult and reflection on the negroes by drawing the color line against them in the public cars in the city of Washington; and it is difficult to believe that the advocates of this measure have not that express purpose in mind.

Your States accepted and adopted the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments on their rehabilitation during the reconstruction period, and immediately their white people conspired to defy and nullify those articles, first by the agency of the Kuklux Klans and other organizations which terrorized the negroes, and killed them if necessary, to keep them from the polls. You prefer to accomplish these ends if possible under color of law and regularity, and your States adopted constitutions with grandfather clauses and other provisions for the disfranchisement of the negroes; and you have passed election laws and enforced them in such a manner as to practically disfranchise all the negroes in the Southern States. You have refined and elaborated those laws until the ingenuity of lawlessness is exhausted to evade the force and effect of those amendments and deprive the negroes of a fair vote and honest count, and you have succeeded.

You now count them for representation in this House and in the electoral college, but you will not permit them to vote. They are citizens for one purpose, but not for the other; and you are permitted to do this by the good nature and forbearance of the people throughout the balance of the country. Intrenched behind those bulwarks of fraud and violence, you have become so bold and defiant as to taunt the Republican party with not keeping its pledges to enforce the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution by compelling you to let the negroes vote, or by reducing your representation in the Congress and electoral college in accordance with the provisions of the fourteenth amendment. Common prudence would suggest that you remain quiet on this delicate question. You should be grateful for being let alone in the enjoyment of your ill-gotten advantages. But you are not. The old prejudice and determination to enforce your views on the rest of the country manifest themselves whenever occasion occurs.

Early in this session, when the revision of the penal statutes was under consideration, you tried to repeal or amend the sections which were enacted by Congress for the execution and enforcement of the fifteenth amendment, and you failed. Now you presume to cross the Potomac and introduce "Jim Crow" cars into the capital of the nation. Should you succeed in this you would not stop. You would endeavor to establish the same rule and the same discrimination against the colored people with reference to all railroads doing interstate commerce throughout the country. You are making a grievous mistake. If we do not understand you or your view point on the race question, you do not understand us or appreciate the sentiment and temper of the people throughout the North and West. You may be able to terrorize, intimidate, and subdue the negroes, but you can not cajole or intimidate the overwhelming mass of the white people in our country. They are patient and long-suffering and have much sympathy for you in your efforts to solve this race problem, but there are limitations to their patience.

You charge us with opposing this proposition for purely political reasons, and that we are grasping at it in order to make political capital; and you say that on a secret ballot there would be but very few votes in this House against it. Let me assure you that you are in error; that we oppose it in good faith, because it is unjust and unfair. We do not believe in caste or class distinctions of this kind. You assert that you are the negro's best friends. Then why do you wish to humiliate and degrade him? Why do you treat him in all political and social matters as an inferior, and keep constantly before his mind that he is practically without the pale of the law? Why do you close against him all avenues of development and advancement? His condition and status in society is hard enough at best. He is excluded from many labor unions, and from industrial and social organizations. He is not permitted to engage in high grade or responsible employments which tend to develop character and ability, and he is driven by necessity, if not from choice, into menial service. Do not deprive him of his rights before the law and under the Constitution. Give him some chance and encouragement that he may develop the best that is in him. Do not shock the conscience of the people by the adoption of this amendment. Do not sully the fair name and fame of the Republic by committing this unlawful, un-Republican, and un-American act.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentlemen? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this amendment be closed in five minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask the chairman of the committee not to make that motion. I want to ask unanimous consent for ten minutes' time, as I am the author of the amendment and several references have been made to me and my section of the country.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me say to the gentleman that outside of the race question this amendment ought not to prevail. The Committee on the District of Columbia that reported this bill to the House feels that all the burdens have been placed upon the railroads of this city that should be placed upon them at this time. When they make the extensions that are required under this bill it will cost a million dollars, besides the proposition of universal transfers. Now, if the gentleman's amendment prevails, in my judgment it will drive the Washington Railway and Electric Company, and possibly other railroads in the District, into bankruptcy, and, it seems to me, if for no other consideration his amendment ought not to prevail.

Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan moves that all debate upon this amendment be closed in five minutes.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Division, Mr. Chairman. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion as I desire to reply to some assaults that have been made on me.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 95, noes 64.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, a condition confronts us and let us be manly and meet it. If the white people object to riding in the same car with negroes, the law ought not to force them to do it.

The racial fact in this case is a stubborn thing and gentlemen had just as well recognize it. You can't legislate it out of men. In the great plan of things it has a great purpose to serve.

In your hopeless condition politically you are grasping at anything and everything with which to make political capital. Since the "prosperity" plank in the Republican platform broke you seize eagerly upon any material available for campaign purposes; and now, when we call on you to provide better street car accommodations for the white and the black races in Washington—when we ask that the dominant race here be relieved from a condition sorely distasteful and aggravating, from a condition where white women suffer indignities and abuses at the hands of negroes on the cars—you try to evade the issue by going into a discussion of the negro's political rights. You take up the old cry—the one with which you have deceived the negro a thousand times. You have gone into office in some localities on that cry many times, and you take it up now on the theory that "it has landed many thousands and will land as many more, glory hallelujah!"

But I do not believe that your soft words and pleasing platitudes about the negroes' political rights will deceive the negro this year. The sensible negro knows that my position on this question is the position of the white race. And I want to say here and now that I believe that if we could have a secret vote on my amendment nearly all of you would vote for it, and those of you who would not vote for it would, deep down in your hearts, pray for its passage. You do not discuss the merits of my amendment. You dare not do it. It is sound and wholesome, and provides equal accommodations for both races, and is a guaranty against the troubles now occurring between the races. The white people want it and the negroes will be better off with its adoption. In those States, and mine is one of them, I am glad to say, where we have separate cars for white and negro passengers, it was found necessary for the peace and harmony between the races to provide separate cars. Prior to the time of separate cars there was no end to troubles and annoyances arising from negroes and white passengers huddled together in the same car, but since we have separate cars, with equal accommodations and the cars are of the same character, the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT] to the contrary notwithstanding, there is no trouble whatsoever between the races—the old cause for trouble on the cars having been removed.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] have left my amendment and they have left the rotten street car service of this city and they have gone to Alabama and have undertaken to discuss the franchise clause in the constitution of my State. Both gentlemen have demonstrated very clearly that they occupy the same relation to the constitution of Alabama that the young man from Kansas did to the law, for when he was asked "What is law?" looked bewildered for a moment and said: "It's that that I know but durn little about." We have the best election law in the Union. We have the educational qualification, the property qualification, so the man who has $300 worth of real or personal property and who can not read and write, can vote, and we have the poll-tax plan. But what has this to do with the obnoxious street car situation in this city?

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] mounts his campaign steed, charges up the mountain of the Federal Constitution, pauses on an elevation overlooking his district and proclaims that "the Federal Constitution guarantees to every citizen the God-given right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." If I can cause him to curb his campaign steed long enough for a question or two, I shall be very happy. I will ask him what part of that constitutional provision is affected by my amendment? Is it the "pursuit of happiness clause?" If so, I will ask him to explain to me and to this House if he wants the negro to "pursue happiness" in the same car with white passengers? Then I will ask him how he will reconcile this same guaranty to the case of the white man who wants to "pursue happiness" in a car to himself?

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER] deplores the fact that such an amendment as mine should be offered on Washington's birthday. Why, Mr. Chairman, my amendment will do more for the peace and happiness of both races in the District of Columbia than any other thing that we can do to-day for the city that bears the immortal Washington's name.

Pass my amendment, and discord and friction between the races will disappear and peace will be restored, and the Bible says, "Blessed is the peacemaker."

If George Washington were living to-day, he would certainly favor my amendment. My amendment deals with a condition that every intelligent man knows is a serious one, and one from which a great deal of bad feeling and racial difficulties have come and will continue to come unless separate cars are provided.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], referring to me, said:

> The legislation which he proposes is purely of a character such as we might expect to be asked to enact by a gentleman coming from the part of the country the gentleman in part represents.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], in the language just used, has paid to me and to the good people that I have the honor to represent a splendid compliment. Yes; coming from a section where at one time we had no separate cars for white and negro passengers, and where this failure to provide separate accommodations was a source of much mischief, of much bitter feeling and difficulty between the races, and having seen the whole trouble settled and peace and harmony restored between the races by the separate-car system, when I see the same conditions here that we once had, and when I know that the remedy we applied will settle the question here and settle it to the best interest of both races, I would fail to do my duty if I did not offer the remedy that I know to be a sure cure.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who failed utterly to discuss my amendment, said among other things, referring to Alabama:

> Laws have been enacted by its legislature preventing these citizens from exercising the rights guaranteed to them by the Constitution, and doubtless methods of intimidation have been practiced which, added to the burdens of unjust laws, would, if exposed to public view, make a record of oppression which would bring a blush of shame to the face of every believer in law and justice the country over.

Mr. Chairman, this statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is a gross misrepresentation of the facts. No such condition exists in Alabama or anywhere else save in the convenient and wild imagination of the gentleman from Illinois, who is making a very disgusting and cheap bid for negro votes in his district. I was not old enough to remember just how a carpetbagger looked, but I believe that I have seen one or the son of one to-day.

Continuing, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] said:

> And now the gentleman from Alabama, under the false cry of social equality, seeks to insert in this bill a provision which he, as a lawyer, knows to be unconstitutional, in order that he may receive the applause of a haughty, austere, and egotistical aristocracy, who are laboring under the false impression that they are the first and the foremost people on earth.

Mr. Chairman, I deny that my amendment is unconstitutional. On the other hand, in my judgment, it would stand the test before the Supreme Court of the United States. This same gentleman from Illinois says that I have offered this amendment in order to receive the applause of a haughty, austere, and egotistical aristocracy who are laboring under the false impression that they are the first and foremost people on earth.

Mr. Chairman, I offered this amendment because I believe that it carries with it the right solution of a very obnoxious and disagreeable system now in force in the District of Columbia. I introduced that amendment because I believe in separate cars for the races. I did not introduce it in order to receive the applause of a "haughty, austere, and egotistical aristocracy."

The gentleman's want of information regarding my district and the proud and patriotic people that I represent is in itself appalling. My people are not "haughty, austere, and egotistical aristocrats." They are as intelligent, as brave, and patriotic a people as live on this earth.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] said, as the climax of his remarks, that my purpose in introducing the amendment was to humiliate the negro "and that I never lost an opportunity to express my views on the negro question when I could add anything to their suffering and humiliation."

Mr. Chairman, I bear no malice toward the negro race. On the contrary, I have the very kindliest feelings and good will for all law-abiding, industrious negroes. The old negroes who were the slaves of my father love him and love his children, and when the gentleman states that my purpose is to humiliate the negro he displays a glaring ignorance of my feelings and motives. The Southern white man is the best friend that the negro has on earth. He knows the negro as nobody else in America knows him. He will not permit anybody to impose on or mistreat a good negro. At the same time we have recognized a racial fact that you do not seem to understand, or if you do understand it you have not the courage to say so.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] may be deceiving himself, but he is not deceiving the negro. He is trying to make political capital of my amendment to regulate the street cars of Washington. He is trying to get up something with which to solidify the negro vote in his district and in the doubtful States, so he can say to the leaders, "It worked like a charm." You told about the treatment of the negro in the South. Let me remind you that there is no community in the South where negroes are not allowed to live, but there are several localities in the North where you absolutely forbid him living. In the South when he commits the unnamable crime he dies, and he deserves to die. Sometimes the mob gets him; but the difference in the mob in the South and the mob in the North is the mob in the South seeks and visits punishment only upon the guilty party, but in the North you shoot them as you come to them and burn them out in communities. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] harps on the negro's political rights. I want to remind the gentleman that some time ago his party put a negro on the ticket for judge in Chicago. He was put on to hold the negro vote to the Republican party. To the surprise of everybody, Republicans and all, he was elected—and then what became of this negro's political rights in the gentleman's own State of Illinois? White Republicans declared that it would not do for a negro to try and sentence white men, and what happened? This negro judge lost his job. The election was over and they got rid of him.

Republicans talk one way and act another. You talk about negroes being disfranchised in the South. You seem to forget that at one time the people of Washington voted, white men and negroes. The Republican party disfranchised the voters of this District and it is a notorious fact that you did it to get rid of the negro voter.

These long-distance champions of the negro's political rights grow pathetic and eloquent when speaking of the downtrodden brother in black, but when the negro wants to move up into their presence we sometimes hear of opposition to his coming.

Some months ago the Indianapolis News called on the negroes already residents there to use their influence to keep out their brethren from the South, saying that the impression is abroad to the effect that Indianapolis is a negro paradise. It warns them against the horrors that will come if these "ignorant, vicious blacks from the South continue swooping down upon the Hoosier capital city."

The Northwestern Christian Advocate, published in the home of the gentleman [Mr. MADDEN], some time ago, in speaking of crime and the frequent arrests of negroes, said: "It is not surprising that the number of arrests of negroes should be out of all proportion to the number of the race." "Race prejudice"—just listen to that, gentleman—"race prejudice, even in the North, forces them to live in districts notorious for crime."

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] had better get the mote out of his own eye before he undertakes to get it out for others.

I would remind the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] of what a distinguished and able Republican once said about the races. At Charleston, Ill., in the gentleman's own State, September 18, 1858, Mr. Lincoln in a speech said:

I will say that I am not and never have been in favor of bringing about in any way the social and political equality of the white and black races; that I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of making voters or jurors of negroes, nor of qualifying them to hold office nor to intermarry with white people; and I will say, in addition to this, that there is a physical difference between the white and black races which I believe will forever forbid the two races living together on terms of social and political equality; and inasmuch as they can not so live, while they remain together there must be the position of superior and inferior, and I, as much as any other man, am in favor of having the superior position assigned to the white race.

Was Lincoln right or is the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] right?

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] made no argument against my amendment. He was content to inform the House and the country that his children and negro children went to the same school and that he and negroes attended the same church. Well, every man to his taste! I do not believe that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] reflects the views of his white constituency on this subject. I am reminded of a politician who shaped his creed for his cravings and swallowed his convictions for a job.

I believe in separate cars for the races, and I believe in separate schools and churches, and I believe that I state the doctrine of the white race on these subjects in spite of the Kansas gentleman's extraordinary views.

In conclusion, I want to say that in spite of the effort of hard-pressed Republicans to make political capital out of my amendment, if you will adopt it, it will be for the very best interests of both races. [Applause on the Democratic side and in the galleries.]

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I trust that in the few minutes allotted to me I may be enabled to calmly and dispassionately discuss the merits of the proposition presented. It is unfortunate that a question of this kind can not be discussed without the Members on the opposite side of the House making an attack on the South and endeavoring to arouse a spirit of hostility between the races. There is no rancor in the breast of the white man in the South against the negro because of his color. We of the South have solved the race problem in our section and in a manner satisfactory to ourselves.

Our laws require a property or an educational qualification and the payment of a poll tax for the benefit of the public schools as a prerequisite for the exercise of the right of suffrage. These laws apply equally to the whites and the blacks. We have separate schools, separate churches, separate waiting rooms at the railroad stations, separate apartments in our street cars, and separate sleeping coach accommodations, as well as separate passenger coaches.

But our laws require that all these accommodations be equal for both races, and these laws are legally enforced.

Our laws forbid the intermarriage of the negroes with the whites.

Before these separate, but equal, accommodations were required for the whites and the negroes frequent conflicts occurred; but this requirement has reduced these conflicts to the minimum and it is rare that a race issue is raised. One of the gentlemen who has preceded me flaunts the fact in our face that negroes are mobbed in the South. When a man, be he white or black, overpowers a pure and helpless woman, and, prompted by his hellish lust, robs her of that which is prized above all else on earth by her, those who would not have her humiliated by detailing the horrible incidents of the fiendish outrage in the courts before the populace inflict summary punishment upon the offender. This is done whether the outrage happens in the North or in the South. It has been done since the fair and virtuous Lucretia plunged the dagger in her heart and caused the proud and haughty Tarquin to be summarily punished for the outrage which he had perpetrated. The fact that she submitted to him because he threatened to disgrace her by charging her with wrongful relations with one with whom it was considered then to be a disgrace for one of her station to be on terms of intimacy, emphasizes the fact that to this day a pure woman had rather suffer death even at her own hands than to be thought guilty of criminal conduct with one below her station in life. She would rather suffer death a thousand times than to be overpowered by a brute in human form, and be forced to submit to the heinous offense which all right-thinking people say should be punished with death.

But the gentleman says that it is the negro who is most frequently mobbed. If we concede his statement as true, we must concede that in a majority of cases it is the negro who commits the crime which brings about this character of punishment. Far be it from me to advocate mob violence. It has been my good fortune never to have been called upon to join in inflicting summary punishment on anyone, although I have lived in the South all my life. While the impulse to summarily punish the ravisher is almost irresistible, there are cases in the South where negroes are tried by the courts, convicted by the juries, and executed under the law. Last year in the city of Shreveport, La., a negro made a brutal assault upon a white schoolgirl on the streets of the city as she returned from school, and in the effort to accomplish his fiendish design shot her brains out in the plain open view of people of his color. He was indicted by the grand jury, tried by the court, convicted by a jury, and hanged by the sheriff. The voice of his victim had been hushed and she was saved from relating the horrible incidents which she would have been forced to relate if she had lived to attend the trial, if such had been had in case she had not died.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] says that he is in favor of the whites and the negroes being allowed to stop at the same hotels, to occupy the same cars, to attend the same schools and churches, and that it is with his approval that his children attend the same school with negroes; but he says that he is not willing for his children to marry negroes. Is there anything more natural than that a white girl should think it is all right for her to marry a negro man if her father sends her to the same school for her to associate with him there in her childhood? If her parents eat with him at the same table at the hotel; if her mother converses with him in the parlor of the hotel; if her father sleeps with him in the same room, or perhaps in the same bed at the hotel; if they occupy the same sleeping coach and wash in the same basin; if they are given cards of admission to the gallery reserved for the Member's family, why draw the line at marrying? But when the question is put to the gentleman from Kansas he cries "No." I say a thousand times, "No!" Does he not know that Fred Douglass, the negro who married a white woman and lived with her in the city of Washington, became acquainted with his wife while he was being entertained by her father at his home?

It is just such speeches as we have listened to here to-day which cause trouble between the races.

Let each race realize its respective sphere and there will be no trouble between them; but let an inferior race get the idea that the party in power is going to afford protection for them in everything which they do and we will continue to have recurrences of the Brownsville affair. But if, when the President asserts his prerogatives and the true manhood which is in him and dispenses with the services of those who are called upon to preserve law and order (and instead of doing so trample the law under their feet) he is condemned by his party associates for political effect, then may we expect to see those who are told that they are being wronged become insolent and bold in their defiance of every principle of right and justice. What do we see right here in the city of Washington, the capital of the greatest nation on earth? Within less than six months twenty-one assaults have been made by negroes on white women and not one of them brought to justice. This week a negro is seen to follow a white man into his own home and there stab him to death, and is seen when he leaves the house with the deadly weapon dripping with the lifeblood of his victim. He may be punished. It is to be hoped that he will; for when the victim's daughter hears his voice at the police station she faints, because she recognizes that it is the voice of the same man who put her father to death.

How long is this state of affairs to continue at the capital of the nation? My prediction is that it will never cease so long as designing politicians pander to the prejudices of the ignorant and the vicious and lead them to believe that they will be protected in their wrongdoing.

A white gentleman will rise to give a lady his seat in the street cars, while strong, able-bodied negro men sit lazily upon the cushioned seats.

If they have not the sense of propriety which will prompt them to act properly, sufficient accommodations should be furnished them in separate cars.

Two cars are run together, anyway, and there is no reason why the white people should not occupy one of these cars and the negroes the other.

What I have said has been without any animosity toward the negroes as a race, but I have simply stated the facts as they are.

As evidence that the white people of the South are willing to do a fair part by the negroes, I cite the fact that while the white people pay the bulk of the taxes the negro children are provided with every facility for becoming educated by the money derived from the taxes which are paid into the treasuries. Three-fourths of the crimes in the South are committed by negroes, but the taxes paid mainly by the white people are used in providing trials for them and the expense of keeping them. They are even furnished with counsel to defend them free of cost when they are unable to employ counsel. I have never known a white lawyer to refuse to defend a negro, whether he was able to pay or not, and he always gets the very best defense that the lawyer can make for him.

I have never known a negro who was innocent to be convicted and punished for a crime which he did not commit; but I have known many guilty ones to be freed on a technicality of the law.

That the negroes are not increasing at the same rate as the white people is accounted for in two ways: There is a large white immigration into the South, but no negro immigration. Then, the negro has been led to believe that the northern man is his especial friend and many of them go to the North to help send the white man to Congress, where there are no negroes, and to place the white man in the other offices to be filled in the North.

Booker T. Washington could not even be nominated for Vice-President on the Republican ticket, much less for President.

I take the liberty of submitting a few figures which will convey some idea of the progress which is being made by the negroes:

Number of negroes over 10 years old in 1880, 4,601,207. Of these, 70 per cent, or 3,220,878, were illiterate.

In 1900 there were 6,415,581, of whom 2,853,194 were illiterate, making 44.5 per cent, showing a decrease of 36 per cent in illiteracy in twenty years. The negroes own approximately 24,000 churches, with a membership of about 3,000,000. The value of their church property is nearly $27,000,000. One million one hundred thousand negro children attend the public schools. Within twenty-five years over $100,000,000 have been spent for the support of negro schools. The negroes of the South own in their own right 173,000 farms, and, including tenants, negroes are in charge of 746,000 farms. The wealth of the negroes will aggregate about $300,000,000. Forty years age the negroes could not read and write; they owned no property; they were thrown out on their own resources to shift for themselves in the midst of their former masters; they were duped and beguiled by false and unscrupulous leaders; but, being treated honestly by the people of the South, they have prospered as no race of paupers ever prospered before. Many of them have become educated—lawyers, physicians, and ministers—and those of the race are respected who conduct themselves in a manner entitling them to respect.

The progress which the negro race has made under the adverse circumstances under which it labored has been one of the wonders of the world. It must be evident to any fair-minded person that if the negroes had been robbed, defrauded, and murdered, as some of our defamers of the North contend, they could not have acquired the property, enjoyed the religion, obtained the education, and have risen in the learned professions as they have.

Away with these taunts and this defamation; allay what friction there may be between the races; cease from the effort to force them to social intercourse, and banish forever the thought that the barrier which nature has placed between the races of mankind can ever be obliterated so long as a drop of noble Caucasian blood courses through our veins. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Division!

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 57, noes 104.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I only want a moment to explain this amendment. The purpose of it is the same, substantially, as is in the text. I think that the purpose of securing the control over these street railways is more perfectly and plainly expressed in the amendment than in the original text. I do not think that the purpose desired is accomplished by the use of the language in the text. At all events, it fails to furnish an adequate remedy; it fails to furnish proper punishment, and it fails to give jurisdiction to the proper tribunal. Its failures are corrected and supplied in the amendment that I have offered. There is no dissimilarity in the general scope of the two, I think, except as I have mentioned; but I do think there is a material difference in the clearness of the language used in the amendment, giving it superiority over the text. I think it is not objectionable to any member of the committee, so far as I know.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the amendment or substitute proposed by the gentleman from Iowa, I think, is the amendment which he kindly submitted to the committee, and which, together with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCMILLAN], were considered, and after the committee had very carefully considered them it decided to ask the corporation counsel to prepare a section covering this amendment and the amendments of Mr. MCMILLAN and Mr. TAYLOR, and as a result we secured the amendment we have in section 18, as named in the bill. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the purpose sought will be accomplished by the passage of section 18 as named in the bill. In other words, it will give notice to the railroads of this city that the people will expect better service than they have been receiving in the past.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Iowa has already stated, much of his amendment is already written into the section which he now seeks to strike out of the bill. It is in the main good, but I do not believe that it is any better than that which is in the bill in the section which he seeks to take out. In the first place, the committee considered carefully the question of imprisonment for failure to comply with its regulations, and after careful deliberation on the part of the entire committee we could not find it proper that a man should be imprisoned. You can not imprison a corporation for its orders to its employees. We can only fine it. The gentleman from Iowa seeks to amend by imposing a prison sentence, and if it were permitted it will only involve some poor motorman or conductor acting under the orders of the company that employs him. You should not punish them by imprisonment or by fine and send them to jail for what, in a general sense, would be a trivial offense.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. If I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, this imprisonment provision does not apply to the universal transfer project, but only applies where the company fails to put on a proper number of cars——

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Exactly.

Mr. NORRIS (continuing). On the tracks, and to give the people proper accommodation.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. True; now, then——

Mr. NORRIS. Then, some poor conductor or motorman, as the gentleman said, could not under any condition be prosecuted for such an offense.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. He can be prosecuted under the act.

Mr. NORRIS (continuing). Where somebody or other might have refused to make a proper order.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. You can not imprison a corporation. That is clear. If the conductor or motorman failed to carry out an order or regulation, the only person who could be punished would be the operatives who failed to carry out a regulation that had been published.

Mr. NORRIS. No; but the conductor and the motorman have nothing to do with fixing the number of the cars or the frequency of the cars.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Then will the gentleman tell us who will be arrested and imprisoned if the cars do not run with proper frequency?

Mr. NORRIS. That would depend on who was at fault. It might be the president of the company, it might be the secretary, it might be the board of directors. I do not know who would be to blame for it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. We provide for a very heavy fine for the violation of regulations to be made by the Commissioners of the District, and we think that is sufficient.

Now, another point. This section in the bill is an outcome of careful study on the part of the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia, who is directed in this bill to enforce the law, and it is a compilation taken from the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa and other papers submitted to the corporation counsel for his consideration. We believe, he being the agent of the District of Columbia who will enforce this law, that his views along these lines should be respected, and his language ought to be left in the bill, because he will be called upon to enforce the provisions of this section.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There was a good deal of confusion in the House, and I did not catch the gentleman's amendment. Will he kindly state what it is?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. The pending amendment is the one offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. It is a complete section in lieu of the present section 18.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is the one that was printed in the RECORD this morning?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, very well.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Now, only one other point that I wish to call attention to. We have provided that prosecutions shall be had in the police court of the District of Columbia by the corporation counsel. The gentleman from Iowa seeks to amend that by bringing the prosecution into the supreme court of the District. I personally can see no reason for any such change, and I so stated to the gentleman.

The last feature that I do object to is this: It is provided in the amendment that a fee of $25 shall be paid to the corporation counsel or his assistant by the party losing in one of these prosecutions. Personally I do not believe in putting any reward in the hands of the prosecuting officer, because in the past, in many cases, under laws in my State, where such a reward was given, it has resulted in making prosecuting officers forget their real duties, and sometimes where men were not exactly straight it has brought on prosecutions which were unjust and simply begun for the purpose of collecting the reward for the service of the prosecutor, and under certain laws, as we all know, has resulted in prosecutions brought for what might be termed the purposes of blackmail. I hope this amendment will not prevail and that the original section in the bill will be retained.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, when the committee framed section 18 of the bill which is now under discussion they gave the entire subject-matter very careful consideration.

The city of Washington is a very difficult city to legislate for in regard to the number of cars that should be run. We have a peculiar condition here. Once every four years there is an immense crowd of people who come to Washington. Probably half a million come here at inauguration time. To my mind, it would be an exceedingly great hardship on the officers of one of these street railroad companies to put them in jail because at that time they did not have cars enough to meet the requirements of this section. Therefore the committee decided to give the Commissioners of the District of Columbia discretionary power to regulate that matter. I am satisfied that the Commissioners of this District will make such regulations as will meet the existing conditions. It is complained here that there are not enough cars to meet the demands of the traveling public. It is believed by the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia that the section reported to this House in this bill will meet the conditions entirely and will prevent the overcrowding which is now such a source of complaint.

There is another innovation in the section as reported here. Under existing law the cars can only run twelve miles an hour in the District, and it is contended that whenever there is a blockade it is practically impossible for the cars to catch up with their schedule time. Therefore the committee has deemed it wise to change the law in that respect and to allow them to run fifteen miles an hour.

Then there is another regulation in the District which is in force and which sometimes makes it difficult for the car companies to operate. Under existing law their cars must run at least 200 feet apart. The companies admit that they are compelled to violate that regulation constantly. We believe that with the section in the bill as reported by the committee the Commissioners of the District of Columbia will have ample power to regulate this entire matter, and that with the enactment of this bill into law the service hereafter will be thoroughly efficient.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, this House did not hesitate a little while ago in the passage of the rate bill to provide the punishment of imprisonment for the officers of a corporation who refused to discharge their duties in compliance with the law. There was none of that special tenderness then, and penalties as high as $25,000 fine and five years' imprisonment were imposed upon those who might be delinquent under the law.

Why is it that there is such excessive tenderness here? The outrages perpetrated daily by these corporations are as great and affect a larger proportion of the people than those that we sought to remedy in the legislation I have referred to. Why is it these gentlemen were so ready on that occasion to vote for all the severity I have suggested and are now so tender and solicitous for fear some miscreant may have to look out through the barred windows of a jail? I can see no reason why the man that refuses obedience to this law should not be punished as other malefactors are. He is a criminal and ought to be punished as a criminal. The gentleman is perfectly willing, he says, that the corporation shall be fined. That is an illogical way of effecting punishment, because it is the people that are wronged that contribute to the revenues of the corporation, and, in the last analysis, the punishment falls upon the people. Railroad corporations do not pay the penalties that are imposed; they disobey until they get the funds that gives them the ability to pay the extra penalties.

I want to see a punishment which they will feel and one which will deter them. What does a manager of one of these roads care for a fine of $15 or $20 or $100 against his corporation? It is nothing to him; he will simply laugh in his sleeve; but if he is going to jail for one or ten or twenty or thirty days he will scan the proposition, and he will be very solicitous as to his line of conduct. I want this legislation to mean something. I simply invite you to look at the loose, disjointed, jumbled sentences there are in the text of the bill. The gentleman says it was written by the corporation counsel. From the little I know of that gentleman and his performance, or want of performance, I assure you, gentlemen, that that is not a commendation, and I think no more of the proposition than if it had come from some other source. I know that this proposition of the amendment means something.

Mr. OLCOTT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Mr. OLCOTT. Does not the gentleman think that the result of his amendment would be that some very junior employee of the road would be embraced in the punishment instead of some higher officer?

Mr. HEPBURN. I would think not; I believe there is no peril on that account. The language of the amendment relating to this subject is this: "Any railroad company herein referred to, or its officers or employees, violating any provision of this section, or any of the orders or regulations made by the Commissioners by authority of the same, or permitting such violations, shall be punished." etc.

I do not presume that if there is an insufficiency of cars, if persons crowded onto those cars, that the man who brings the prosecution—this indorsed corporation attorney—I do not presume he will look for the insignificant motorman who stops the car, or the conductor who refuses to expel a person; but I would go to this officer who permits it, the responsible party, the man who ought to be held responsible and the man who ought to be punished. He has his selection. He might, it is true, elect to punish the motorman or the conductor, but would he, would you, when there was a responsible agent at the head of the corporation who was the real author of the wrong, who permitted it to be done, who made the schedule, who made it a necessity—would he be allowed to go scot-free?

Mr. OLCOTT. Does not the gentleman think it would be necessary to obtain a conviction under his amendment to prove that each particular isolated case was permitted by some higher official?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think that if there is a schedule of car operations that does not furnish proper facilities, that man would be indicted for that offense.

I do not suppose that under the amendment, as I offer it, a single case where there may be something of overcrowding would be made the basis of a prosecution, but it would be the continued, the frequent, the outrageous violation of the obligation of the carrier that would be regarded as obnoxious.

Mr. OLCOTT. Does the gentleman not think that in what we call the rush hours, when all of the cars are out that can be accommodated, if we are to give people seats and have no overcrowding, it would make it necessary for some of the people to wait for half an hour?

Mr. HEPBURN. I know it would not. I have investigated that question, and I know that even with a six-mile-an-hour schedule, the roads of this city, if cars were operated at a proper distance apart, could do this, and practically everybody could be accommodated and everybody could have a seat; but if that were done, Mr. Chairman, there would not be a fund out of which to pay 5 per cent dividends on eight and one-half millions of watered stock. The gentleman's contention is in the interest of paying these dividends upon watered stock.

Mr. OLCOTT. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman whether he really means I have asked these questions with any such idea as that?

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, no; the gentleman is not conscious of it, of course not. [Laughter.] And I accuse him of no such offense as that. It is the enthusiasm that men have to get upon the floor that has prompted him. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will be adopted. It will make an effective section, and we can through it compel obedience to those duties that are imposed by law upon the corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I would like to have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, before the question is taken I want to ask for information of the gentleman from Iowa. As I heard the amendment read, that provided simply for the enforcement of the orders of the Commissioners made in pursuance of section 18, and this section 18 provides for the enforcement of the orders of the Commissioners not only made in accordance with section 18, but with any other section of the bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think not.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think it does, if I heard it correctly. That is a very important matter—made in accordance therewith or thereunder—something of that kind; that relates to the section.

Mr. HEPBURN. That is what I desire to limit the operation of this section to.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then where is there any provision which will punish them if they do not obey the orders provided for by the other sections?

Mr. HEPBURN. There is another provision, I suppose, in regard to that.

Mr. OLCOTT. Section 19 provides for that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will call the gentleman's attention to this language of section 18. I read from the report of the committee.

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, well, the gentleman will find the amendment that I offer is in the RECORD of this morning.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am reading the original section 18, which it is proposed to strike out by this amendment. The language of section 18 is as follows:

> Any such company or corporation or its officers or employees violating any provision of this section, or any of the said orders or regulations made by the Commissioner, etc.

It does not say "in accordance with this section," but relates to any orders made by the Commissioners.

Mr. HEPBURN. This is the language of my amendment:

> Any railroad company herein referred to, or its officers or employees, violating any provision of this section, or any of the orders or regulations made by the Commissioners by authority of the same——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. By authority of that section.

Mr. HEPBURN. Of that section. It is all in this section. All the legislation that I desire is in this section.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does that leave anything in the bill to punish the railway if it does not obey the orders of all the sections?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not know where that is.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman will find that in each of the sections and then the general provision in section 19.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question. If I understand his amendment right, it requires the railway companies at all times to furnish accommodation for all their passengers, and if they do not do it the officers or motormen or conductors are liable to this fine and imprisonment. Is that the general scope of the amendment?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, the language imposes a penalty upon the corporation, its officers or agents or employees who violate the provisions of the section. Now, if it is not the duty of the motorman to put on a sufficient number of cars to give convenient passage to persons who may want to ride, he can not be harmed under this section.

Mr. KAHN. Does not the section read, "failure to provide?"

Mr. HEPBURN. The provisions of this section are those that require the corporation to perform its duties in the furnishing of a sufficient number of proper cars to give expeditious and comfortable travel to all people who want to ride.

Mr. PAYNE. At all times?

Mr. HEPBURN. At all times.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman yields the floor, I want to say a word or two. I can not vote for an amendment of this kind. I do not think it is reasonable or just to require a railroad company to furnish sufficient accommodations for all the passengers at all times. No man or set of men can do that. They can not make a schedule to do it. It is beyond human ken and possibility that officers of a railroad can do this. I am willing to vote for any proposition that will require them, within reason, to furnish accommodations for their passengers. We all know, for instance, that during inauguration times——

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman will read the first four lines of the section, he will find what is required.

Mr. PAYNE. I listened to the reading of his amendment, and I got an interpretation from the gentleman.

Mr. HEPBURN. This is the language:

> That every street railway company operating one or more railroads within the District of Columbia shall, on each and all of its railroads, supply and operate such a number of cars as will give comfortable, convenient, and expeditious passage to all persons desirous of the use of said cars.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, that, I think, bears out my interpretation of it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Ought not they to do that?

Mr. PAYNE. No; I do not think it is possible for human wisdom and foresight to provide that. Take it in inauguration time, it is a physical impossibility for these railroads to carry all the passengers who apply for passage without crowding the cars and crowding the platforms, and still if they fail to do it on any one car or any half dozen cars, the officers of the road, and possibly the conductors and motormen, would be liable to fine or imprisonment, or both. I do not think that we ought to pass laws that are so impossible of performance as that.

Mr. HEPBURN. May I ask the gentleman a question? Do not you suppose that the court would interpret this law in a reasonable way, and that on these extraordinary occasions it would recognize the fact that they were then existing?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know but what they would to the extent of declaring it unconstitutional; I am not quite sure about that; but if the power to enforce the law should be upon the statute books, and if constitutional, I do not see how they could help punishing all persons who violated this section.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield for a moment? Under the provisions of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Iowa, if the corporation counsel went into court to commence action he would get $25 for every time he brought suit——

Mr. PAYNE. That would be an encouragement to him.

Mr. KAHN. And he would probably find a good many during inauguration time.

Mr. PAYNE. I was going to say I had seen it stated in the papers, I do not know whether there is any truth in it, that the Committee on the District of Columbia was considering the matter of bringing in a bill for a public utilities commission, which should have charge of public utilities and franchises in the District of Columbia, and I hope that they will see their way clear to report such a measure. We have a couple of those commissions in the State of New York; they have not been in operation for a great length of time, and they have not accomplished a great deal yet, but in the up-State, in my part of the State, that commission has done a great deal of good in helping to solve this question whether the public-service corporations were not doing their duty to the public, and very often they find them in that way, and they have done a great deal by negotiation and conference. They are now about to enter upon the trial of some cases in my own vicinity where complaint is made that a certain railroad does not furnish sufficient passenger trains for the accommodation of the public.

The Commission have taken the matter up. They have power to take evidence. They have the power under the law—at least by the terms of the law—and I hope they will ultimately find out that they have the constitutional power, after the matter has been tried, as it is being tried, in the courts to order additional accommodations where such accommodations appear to be reasonable and necessary and required from the conditions of the travel and for the benefit of the public.

Now, if this amendment related to the orders of this Commission and one was appointed, I would not object to fine and imprisonment if the officers failed to obey the orders of the Commission. But when you put upon a man the duty of guarding against circumstances which he can not foresee, which no one of us would foresee if we had full charge of the running of these railroads, and say, "If you fail to guard against those contingencies, you are liable to fine and imprisonment," I think you are going too far. I like the proposition very well that the committee have presented here, although very drastic. They have given a good deal of care to it. They say that they have taken the language of the amendments offered heretofore by my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] on this subject and the ideas that were expressed in his former amendments, and it seems to me they have done pretty well with this question. They have gone a long ways toward solving it. But you can not make a railroad perfect in its operation unless you make perfect men, and of course you can not find them in the railroad service or in any other service. I am sorry to differ with my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], but I must vote against this amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ALEXANDER] is recognized.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. If I understand correctly the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] it would subject the conductor to arrest, subject to imprisonment, provided he stopped his car to take on a passenger if the seats were at that time filled. Or, putting it in another form, the conductor of a car would have it in his power to say when he should stop for a passenger, for the law would protect him in not stopping the moment the seats in his car were filled. Such an amendment would be in the interest of the hack driver and of the cab driver. If in a hurry to reach my destination and a car comes along with every seat filled, I should be willing and glad to stand. But the conductor could say, if this amendment passes, "Oh, no. If I stop for you I shall be liable to arrest and imprisonment." I am sure the gentleman from Iowa does not want to put every Member of Congress or every traveler who is waiting for a car to the inconvenience of losing a train because the seats in a street car happen to be filled. Yet this is what his amendment might do. Everybody is familiar with the annoyances of travel in London and Paris, where drivers of wagons and omnibuses are compelled to refuse passengers as soon as all seats are taken. No one is allowed to stand. It is comfortable for those who happen to have seats, but for the waiting passenger, especially if it rains or he be in a hurry, it is very exasperating.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The point made by my colleague from New York [Mr. ALEXANDER] I think is important. This is the first proposed provision of this character that attempts to fasten upon the employees of railroad companies the responsibility for the management of railroads, or for the failure to provide adequate accommodations to the traveling public. There has been some effort at different places to attempt to compel those responsible for the management of common carriers to provide adequate facilities for the traveling public, but this is a long step in advance, namely, to hold the subordinate employees, motormen, or conductors, or those occupying a little higher place, responsible for the things they can not control, and for some things which they must do in order to retain their positions. I doubt the advisability of adopting a provision so sweeping as the pending substitute, that may imperil the liberty or the comfort or the happiness of the men employed upon the street railways in this District.

There is another provision of the amendment which I have examined hastily to which I have great objection, and that is the provision giving a premium to the corporation counsel for conducting these prosecutions. I doubt, Mr. Chairman, if the effect of the provision would be to incite many attempts to have this law enforced. Under it where the prosecution is successful the railway company will be mulcted to an amount not exceeding $25; but there is a deterrent in the provision, since any citizen making a complaint, if the complainant be unsuccessful, can have assessed against him costs for the benefit of the prosecuting attorney, not exceeding $25. I doubt if there is a statute in any State of such peculiar character. I am inclined to believe it would result in nullifying any beneficial effect that the section might otherwise have. I am inclined to believe that this section has not been framed with any more care than the one reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

I have had the honor of the acquaintance of the gentleman who is now corporation counsel of the District. In my work upon the Committee on Appropriations it has been necessary to confer with that gentleman. I believe he is a well-equipped, splendid lawyer. I believe he is a man of high integrity. I know that he has drafted some provisions intended for the purpose of making effective laws that the committee desired to have made effective against the steam railroads in this city. They accomplished the purpose intended. I doubt very much if the gentleman from Iowa, from what he has stated about the gentleman who drew this provision, has a very intimate acquaintance either with him or his powers and qualifications. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that whether the provision reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia be sufficiently broad or not that it would be the utmost folly for this House to adopt the substitute of the gentleman from Iowa without having a very adequate opportunity to examine it and without having it considered by one of the committees of this House.

I can not say that I have always had the utmost confidence in the result of the work of the Committee on the District of Columbia; but in the examination that I have been able to make of the two provisions, I doubt if the one proposed by the gentleman from Iowa, if substituted, would be such as would commend itself to men who desire to affect certain well-known evils, not to punish the poorly paid $2-a-day employees of the railroad because inadequate facilities are furnished, but who desire, if punishment is to be inflicted, that it be inflicted upon the responsible heads of the various corporations. I trust that as long as the substitute is in the shape it is that this committee will not adopt it in place of the provision of the bill.

[Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, those of us who have been in this House for some time have always noticed that when a proposition is made to punish a railroad corporation or the servant, the general manager of that corporation, there is always some well-fed, good-looking gentleman ready to defend them, always solicitous for fear that, in the clauses of the statute that might punish him, some unfortunate, some poor, obscure individual probably might be punished. [Applause.] I suggest to the gentleman that the legislation we have had in regard to the 220,000 miles of road is not dissimilar to this. Did the gentleman then insist that the brakemen would be the object of the penalty of the law?

The objection that my friend has to this amendment results from his belief in the impossibility of the observance of this law. That objection might be made against the committee's bill as well as the amendment. They do not differ essentially at all except the one is in terse English and the other is a labyrinth of words. Let me read the eighteenth section of the bill as reported.

That every street railway company or corporation owning, controlling, leasing, or operating one or more roads—

There are roads here owned by one class of persons who do not operate them. Under the provision in this bill, is not the gentleman fearful that some of these parties that are owning the roads, but not operating them, might perchance be punished? Why are you not solicitous about that? And the supposition that was made in regard to the conductor and motorman is quite as farfetched as the suggestion that I make to him—

Controlling, leasing, or operating one or more street railroads within the District of Columbia shall on each and all of its railroads supply and operate such number of cars, clean, sanitary, in good repair, with proper and safe power, equipments, appliances, and service, comfortable and convenient, and so operate the same as to give expeditious passage, not to exceed 15 miles per hour, to all persons desirous of the use of said cars, without crowding said cars or the platforms thereof.

Why has not the gentleman the same criticism for that? Does he find anything in the amendment that I have offered requiring more than that? The language is mixed so that it forms a mere jumble of words. There is not one essential difference between my amendment and that of the proposition of the committee. I read that sentence, and I read it correctly, showing that there is a jumble of unnecessary words in improper places. It is a shame to put on the statute book language of that kind. It is not good English——

Mr. McMILLAN. I will say to the gentleman that language is the language to-day that exists in the State of New York, that created a committee whereby this has been tested in court, and I am responsible for that language, whereby not one can escape; and the parties that were controlling—that means who had bought the stock controlling—and had left the rest of the stock on the books, and claimed that they were not responsible, the same parties would be held for any damage that was created either to life or to limb by nonperformance of duty.

Mr. HEPBURN. I yielded for a question. Now let us read further:

Shall on each and all of its railroads supply and operate such number of cars, clean, sanitary, in good repair, with proper and safe power, equipment, appliances, and service, comfortable and convenient, and so operate the same as to give expeditious passage, etc.

Does anybody say that is language fit to go into a statute? Again, the gentleman is very solicitous for fear that the brakeman shall be punished. He has not read the law that he was advocating. He does not know what its provisions are. He did not know the similarity between it and the amendment in the part that I read. Now, listen to another part:

And such railroad companies or corporations, their officers and employees, are hereby required to obey all the provisions of this section, and such regulations and orders as may be made by said Commissioners. Any such company or corporation, or its officers or employees, violating any provision of this section, or any of the said orders or regulations made by the Commissioners, or permitting such violation, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000.

Are you going to fine the motorman a thousand dollars? You may, for he is an employee. There is no such severity of punishment for the employees in the section that I have proposed, and I have only called attention to this for the purpose of showing how learnedly some gentlemen may discuss a proposition, while they are profoundly ignorant with regard to all that the provision contains. [Laughter.]

SEVERAL MEMBERS. "Vote!"

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

The question being taken, on a division [demanded by Mr. HEPBURN] there were—ayes 55, noes 63.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that this is the 22d of February, I desire to submit a few remarks upon the subject of Washington's Farewell Address:

To understand Washington's Farewell Address we must go back to his time. We see Washington and his Cabinet of two or three chosen advisers often appearing personally before a joint meeting of the Senate and House—a small meeting, too, for there were only twenty-six Senators in all and sixty Representatives. We see a scattered people in a new country, and the father of his country comes to that people, to his friends and fellow-citizens, the first man of the new nation, bidding farewell to public life at the early age of 64 years. He speaks to them as a parent to the children whom he loves, and whose approval he therefore desires, not for the sake of fame or display, but because he loves them and wants their good will. He is thinking of them and the new nation. The absorption in that thought is princely. Yet it was a self-made prince. For forty-five years he had given his services to his country. The surveyor of the infant colonies amid Indian wilds; the aid-de-camp who saved the wreck of Braddock's army; the general whose skill and fortitude alone made the Revolution possible; the father of our present Constitution; twice President of the new State; though he was young, he felt that his work was done.

He had seen hard times, virulent criticism, and violent passions,

> And then he saw the hisses changed to cheers,
> The taunts to tribute, the abuse to praise,
> And took both in the same unwavering mood.

The Farewell Address says nothing of the agony of Valley Forge or the triumph of Yorktown. His thought and prayer are for the future of the new nation, over which he yearns as a mother that remembereth not the anguish for joy that a man is born into the world. He finds the completion of his work in the new birth, that the love of liberty is but the beginning and that the end is the Union, the State, the Constitution that their own hands had framed, giving to the people a Government that mere alliance could never give, realizing the name of American which he says belongs to them, and embodying their common struggles and sufferings, their common hopes and aspirations. He tells them that sentiment and interest alike bind us together—North, South, East, and West—and that Union alone can support liberty. He exhorts us look to that Union as our palladium of safety and prosperity, to speak and think of it with constant affection, to discourage amendment lest that should breed the spirit of change, to let the Constitution grow as all government must grow—from within; and so to work out the destiny of one nation, whose Constitution, once adopted by the people, is sacredly obligatory upon all and can be changed only by the explicit and authentic act of the whole people.

His courage calls it a crime to doubt the continuance of the nation. He tells us that amid such prospects and such dangers as surround us the Union is worth the trial. He earnestly warns us against party spirit and animosities, and against any encroachment by one department upon the other. He urges the support of religion and of morality as the pillars of human happiness and the props of all government. He tells us to promote education as of primary importance, to cherish the public credit, and yet be prepared for war, to deal fairly with all other nations, but to avoid hatred or fondness for any, and especially to guard against any passionate attachment to any one nation, and to steer clear of permanent alliances, or even a permanent commercial policy with any nation of the world.

In the earnestness of the retiring chief we read an anxiety which only history can explain. Only two years after the Constitution had been adopted he had seen the French Revolution, its constitutions of a day or of a year, the carmagnole of party strife, and the sudden destruction of the property, credit, and institutions of that nation. That revolution was then in the height of its power. Our chief says nothing of all this, but it is plainly in his thought, and he urges on his children reverence for law, union, peace, a fear of party spirit, economy, religion, a hatred of change, and strict maintenance of the public credit. Clearly he was thinking of the wild doctrine of the rights of man as an individual and of the downfall of the rights of society, which characterized the French Revolution, and are still a potent force even in the modern world.

At the end of a hundred years we know how much he saw with prophetic eye, and how much this sympathy with France, which he dreaded, had to do with drawing us into a disastrous war with England. The growth of the Union has surpassed the greatest hopes of this greatest heart that America has ever seen. He feared that the border colonies might attempt to ally themselves with the owners of the Mississippi, but now the Mississippi is ours. The handful of people along the shore is now a great nation bound together by avenues of communication, railroads, telegraph, and the press, of which he never dreamed. The Union that he loved has become dear to the people and has been sealed with the blood of a million men.

He did not see the chief dangers that beset us from within. He could not foresee that slavery (then a matter of farm and family service) would by the growth of the production of cotton and rice become a great engine of oppression and so change the character of the States wherein it prevailed as to make it necessary to destroy slavery to preserve the Union. He could not foresee the tremendous inflow to this country from all nations of Europe, bringing with it on the one hand new energies, activities, arts, and sciences, and a new breadth of thought and feeling, but, on the other hand, imposing problems, and especially a task of education, which are like the labors of Hercules. He could not foresee that communities of fishermen and farmers would become in a hundred years an aggregation of enormous cities, whose toiling millions seldom or never see the open fields, the open sky, or the open sea, and feel themselves oppressed by factory walls.

Yet, at the end of a century, in the face of these problems, we turn to his words: "Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? Let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal." Free government is worth the trial. A nation which loves not only liberty, but law and order, religion and morality, honesty and truth, peace and fair dealing, a nation which maintains and promotes, "as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge," and remembers that "in proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened;" such a nation need not fear that "the happiness of the people of these States, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation and so prudent a use of this blessing as will acquire them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection, and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, and with the recommendation that as amended it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and Mr. DALZELL having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MANN, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 902) authorizing certain extensions to be made of the lines of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company, the Washington Railway and Electric Company, the City and Suburban Railway of Washington, and the Capital Traction Company, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, and with the recommendation that as amended the bill do pass.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any of the amendments? If not, the amendments will be voted upon in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Michigan, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE AND LIGHT-HOUSE KEEPERS.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce and Labor was discharged from the further consideration of the bills—

H. R. 17710, to increase the efficiency of the personnel of the life-saving service of the United States; and

H. R. 17711, to increase the salaries of light-house keepers.

And the same were referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTIONS AND BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolutions and bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. R. 48. Joint resolution instructing the Attorney-General to institute certain suits, etc.—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. R. 49. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to permit not exceeding seven Filipinos to receive instruction at the United States Military Academy—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. R. 51. Joint resolution providing for additional lands for Idaho under the provisions of the Carey Act—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 5133. An act to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the Winnepeg, Yankton and Gulf Railroad Company to construct a combined railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Yankton, S. Dak.—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 4248. An act to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at Kearney, Nebr.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 1702. An act to reimburse H. R. King—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1617. An act to quiet title to certain land in Dona Ana County, N. Mex.—to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

S. 1302. An act for the relief of the heirs of Salvador Costa—to the Committee on War Claims.

S. 486. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Victoria, in the State of Texas—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 160. An act to aid in the erection of a monument or memorial at Point Pleasant, W. Va., to commemorate the battle of the Revolution fought at that point between the colonial troops and Indians October 10, 1774—to the Committee on the Library.

S. 5255. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 5254. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent children of such soldiers and sailors—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 5083. An act to amend section 1 of the passenger act of 1882—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

MARGARET K. HERN.

The Speaker pro tempore laid before the House the bill (S. 2420) granting an increase of pension to Margaret K. Hern, with House amendments disagreed to by the Senate.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist upon its amendments to the bill and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Speaker pro tempore appointed Mr. HOLLIDAY, Mr. CHANEY, and Mr. ANSBERRY as conferees on the part of the House.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON INDUSTRIAL ARTS AND EXPOSITIONS.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions be authorized to have such printing done as is requisite in the transaction of its business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What committee is that?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions. They desire to have a hearing printed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman written a resolution on the subject? It is customary to have a written resolution. The gentleman can easily prepare one, and nobody will object to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts send up his written resolution?

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions have leave to have such printing and binding done as is necessary in the transaction of its business.

The resolution was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I give notice that on Monday morning, after the reading of the Journal, I shall move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, February 24, 1908, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a reply to the inquiry of the House in relation to the reduction of the force of skilled labor in the Washington Navy-Yard, was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. HAMMOND, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15725) to relinquish, release, and confirm the title of certain lands in California to the Western Power Company, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1053), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MARSHALL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 17514) to provide additional station grounds for the Arizona and California Railway Company in the Colorado River Indian Reservation, Ariz., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1054), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 13659) to establish a biological and fish-cultural station in the Second Congressional District of the State of Iowa, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1055), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 11733) punishing conspiracy to injure or intimidate any person in the exercise of a right under the Constitution or laws of the United States, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1056), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. MANN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 24) to increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Revenue-Cutter Service, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1057), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. TIRRELL, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. THE UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I present a petition which I ask may be read and printed in the RECORD, with the names appended to it.

There being no objection, the petition was read, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, with the names appended, as follows:

To the Representatives and Senators in Congress:

We, the undersigned clergymen of New York City, voicing, as we believe, the sentiments of many thousands of American citizens, earnestly protest against the extravagant demand for an addition of over $60,000,000 in the form of four new battle ships, cruisers, etc., to the naval budget of last year, inasmuch as no danger threatens the country not known last April when President Roosevelt told the world: "We are no longer enlarging our Navy. We are simply keeping up its strength. The addition of one battle ship a year barely enables us to make good the units which become obsolete."

Sixty-five per cent of the national income is now expended on war past and present. The increase of our naval budget has recently been used in the French Assembly as a reason for increasing its own, is largely responsible for the increase of armaments among Asiatic nations, and is well-nigh certain to retard that reduction in the armaments of the world for which we have so long been waiting.

The growing discontent throughout the world at the appalling increase of waste of national resources must be heeded. We feel that this protest is the more necessary inasmuch as there are various new and effective methods now available for promoting international friendship and rationally settling difficulties, which these new demands seem to ignore.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4777) restricting in certain cases the right of appeal to the Supreme Court in habeas corpus proceedings, reported it without amendment.

INLAND WATERWAY FROM MOBILE BAY.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. JOHNSTON on the 17th instant, reported it without amendment:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be made an examination and survey of an inland waterway from Mobile Bay to Perdido Bay, in the State of Alabama, and from said Perdido Bay to Escambia Bay, in the State of Florida, for the purpose of estimating the probable cost of the construction of a canal 300 feet wide by 9 feet deep, or of such width and depth as will be sufficient to permit of the navigation of such vessels as ordinarily navigate said bays, and for other purposes.

SALARY OF DISTRICT JUDGE FOR PORTO RICO.

Mr. FORAKER. I report back from the Committee on the Judiciary, with amendments, the bill (S. 2210) to increase the salary of the United States district judge for Porto Rico, and I submit a report thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments were, on page 5, after the words "hundred and," to strike out "seven" and insert "eight," so as to read "nineteen hundred and eight;" and in the same line, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seven" and insert "six," so as to read "$6,000 per annum," making the bill read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the salary of the United States district judge for Porto Rico shall, from and after the 1st day of July, 1908, be $6,000 per annum.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. OWEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

AMENDMENT TO OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. JOHNSTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

COTTON-SEED PRODUCTS IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, on the 14th instant, on my motion, the Senate adopted a resolution ordering the printing of 3,000 copies of a pamphlet entitled "Cotton-seed Products of Foreign Countries." Since the resolution was adopted it has developed that there should be added to it some other publications, and for that reason the order of the Senate has not been carried out and the printing has not been done. At the instance of the Department of Commerce and Labor, and also of parties who are interested in cotton-seed products, it is desired that there should be added reports of special agents and consular officers relative to the subject received since the pamphlet was originally issued.

I send to the desk a resolution which I ask may be considered and adopted, not with a view of authorizing an additional number, but that it shall take the place of the resolution already adopted, the number being the same, the simple difference being in the addition of the other publications.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate, and be delivered to the Senate document room, 3,000 copies of a pamphlet issued by the Department of Commerce and Labor and entitled "Cotton-seed Products in Foreign Countries," and that the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be instructed to assemble and include in the publication reports from special agents and consular officers received since the said pamphlet was issued.

ESTATE OF JOSEPH H. GALLAHER.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate consider at this time the bill (H. R. 6515) for the relief of J. A. Gallaher, administrator of the estate of Joseph H. Gallaher, deceased. It is a bill I reported on Saturday from the Committee on Finance.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem, in favor of J. A. Gallaher, administrator of the estate of Joseph H. Gallaher, deceased, United States coupon 5–20 bonds, act of March 3, 1865, consols of 1865, Nos. 22421, 22422, 61411, 61412, 61413, 61414, 61415, 61416, 61417, 137836, 137837, 137838, 209608, each of the denomination of $1,000, with interest from January 1, 1872, to date of maturity of the respective calls in which the bonds were included, the bonds and interest coupons alleged to have been lost or destroyed. But J. A. Gallaher, administrator, shall first file in the Treasury a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal of the bonds and accrued interest thereon to the date of their maturity, with good and sufficient sureties to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, with conditions to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any claim because of the lost or destroyed bonds hereinbefore described and the interest thereon.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVISON CHEMICAL COMPANY, OF BALTIMORE, MD.

Mr. GALLINGER obtained the floor.

Mr. RAYNER. I rose to ask unanimous consent for the passage of Senate bill 4632, a bill similar to one which was favorably reported in the House at the last Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator from Maryland if the bill will give rise to any debate?

Mr. RAYNER. None at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. With the understanding that the bill will not give rise to any debate and with a notice that I shall object to any further agreement to consider bills this morning, I yield to the Senator with pleasure.

Mr. RAYNER. When the bill was reached on the Calendar it was passed over on the ground that there was no report filed. I desire to file the report of the committee. The Department has decided in favor of it. I also desire an amendment made to the bill. There is an error on the face of the bill that I want to have corrected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 4632) for the relief of the Davison Chemical Company, of Baltimore, Md., and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was, in line 6, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "thirteen," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Davison Chemical Company, of Baltimore, Md., the sum of $13,460, in payment for damages sustained to the sulphuric-acid plant owned by said company and located at Hawkins Point, Maryland, by reason of the firing of high-power guns at Fort Armistead, Md., in April, 1903, said amount having been found due the said company by two boards of Army officers convened by the Secretary of War, as set forth in House Document No. 659, second session Fifty-eighth Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RAYNER. On behalf of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] I desire to file an additional report. It ought to have been presented in the first instance.

Mr. KEAN. Let the reports be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the reports were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

February 11, 1908, Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following report (to accompany S. 4632):

The Committee on Claims, to whom Senate bill 4632 was referred for consideration, having examined the same, report the same favorably and recommend its passage without amendment.

The committee, in support of the foregoing report, beg leave to refer to the report of Mr. Wellborn, from the Committee on Claims, made to the Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, being report 4177 of that session.

February 24, 1908, Mr. RAYNER (for Mr. CLAPP), from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following additional report (to accompany S. 4632):

The Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8670) for the relief of the Davison Chemical Company, of Baltimore, Md., have had the same under consideration, and recommend its passage.

This bill directs the payment of claims for damages aggregating $13,460, made by the Davison Chemical Company, of Baltimore, Md., on account of injury done to its sulphuric acid plant at Hawkins Point, Maryland, by the firing of the high-power guns located at Fort Armistead, Md., in April, 1903.

On July 13, 1903, upon representations being made to the War Department that the artillery practice at Fort Armistead would destroy much property belonging to the Davison Chemical Company, General Chaffee, commanding the Department of the East, was directed to postpone firing until the matter could be investigated, whereupon Col. D. H. Kinzie, Artillery Corps, commanding the district of Baltimore, made an examination of the works of the Davison Chemical Company, and reported as follows:

HEADQUARTERS ARTILLERY DISTRICT OF BALTIMORE, MD.,
Fort McHenry, Md., July 21, 1903.

Respectfully returned to the adjutant-general, Department of the East, with the information that, accompanied by Mr. James McNab, superintendent, I went over the works of the Davison Chemical Company, near Fort Armistead, on the 20th instant.

The damage which the company maintains was caused by firing of the 8-inch B. L. R. last April consists in the cracking and weakening of the brick flues, kilns, the disarranging of the packing of the Glover towers, and the weakening of the headwork of the acid towers. That recent damage to these parts of the works had been done was evident from their appearance; it was also evident from their construction that it would be necessary to stop the works and rebuild the towers and kilns in order to repair them; but I believe it to be impossible for anyone not an expert to determine whether or not these damages were the result of the firing at Fort Armistead. None of the parts injured have been built more than three years, and Mr. McNab assures me that the average life of a tower is twelve years.

The factory is one of the largest in the country and has a daily output of 150 tons of acid. To free the towers from acid so that men could work in them would take a week; to repair them would take two weeks, and a week longer would be necessary to start the works. It is evident that a month's shut down to a company doing as large a business as this one, aside from the direct cost of repairs, would be a matter of great expense; and if continued target practice is to do damage of this nature, the cost to the Government would be far greater than is proportionate to the value of target practice.

I believe that expert testimony is needed to obtain an accurate report on the matter.

A rough description of the works, and a pencil plan furnished by Mr. McNab, is inclosed.

D. H. KINZIE,
Colonel, Artillery Corps, Commanding District.

On August 7, 1903, the Davison Chemical Company presented a claim to the War Department for $6,260, accompanied by the following letter from its superintendent:

BALTIMORE, August 7, 1903.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request of yesterday for a report from me in writing as to the damage done the sulphuric-acid plant of this company at Hawkins Point by the firing of the 8 and 10 inch guns at Fort Armistead last spring, with my estimate of the cost of restoring the same, I have to submit the following:

Our works at Hawkins Point are adjacent to the fort, the most southeasterly gun being about 200 feet distant from our towers, which are in direct line with the guns. I submit herewith a couple of sketches intended to show the ground plan of the chambers, towers, and kilns, and the interior construction of said towers as they are used at our factory. On each of these towers there are lead curtains a quarter of an inch thick, necessary for the inclosure of the acid and gases. The same kind of curtains, though of lighter lead, are used in the chambers for the same purposes.

The concussion of the guns causes the lead on curtains of chambers to collapse, and they are torn at the sides and roof. In the same way, with much more damage, however, the curtains in the towers are torn, and the packing of said towers is disarranged, with the result that the hot gases thereby attack the lead and cut it out. This damage is not apparent at once. It may take weeks, or even months, for this to show itself. Such is the character of the damages that have resulted from the firing in April. Our A Glover tower and chamber in A set we will have to shut down by October next, so that the same may be rebuilt. I am in hopes that by repairing the other towers we can keep them going for some time yet, but I have already had to repair a slit 20 feet high on C Glover tower, and am afraid the interior packing of this is also damaged.

The Gay-Lussac towers, being packed with coke and brick, are not likely to show the damage for some time. It becomes apparent in bad draft.

The A, B, and C set of chambers and towers which are nearest to the fort have all been rebuilt and renewed within the last two or three years, and should do their work with little trouble or expense for repairs or rebuilding during the period of ten or fifteen years.

There is considerable damage done to the double arches of our pyrites kilns. There are 100 of them, but I can not estimate the extent of this damage until we shut down, cool off, and examine them. This we can not do at present, because with our seven large sets of chambers, with a total capacity of over 1,000,000 cubic feet, worked to its full capacity, we are much behind in our orders. If we are compelled to stop manufacturing to repair and rebuild, it will be a very heavy loss to us, and will reduce our output largely. I am preparing for this now by accumulating material at the works. I will not attempt at present to estimate damage due to lessened production, nor to any other repairs than those mentioned on accompanying statements.

In reply to your question as to my experience with sulphuric-acid plants, I would say that I have been engaged as manager for such plants for from thirty-five to forty years in England, Scotland, and the United States.

Respectfully, JAMES MCNAB,
Superintendent Davison Chemical Company.

JOHN H. WIGHT, Esq.,
Vice-President Davison Chemical Company, Baltimore.

1.—To rebuild A Glover tower, 1903.

Lead for tower and connections, 40,000 pounds, at 5.05 cents	$2,020
Labor on lead works	250
Acid-proof chemical brick, 25,000, at $28 per M	700
Acid-proof slabs and special	300
Lumber and labor	350
Bricks and labor, foundations, etc	800
Sundry expenses, unpacking and repacking, etc	180
Gross cost	4,600
Deduct for old lead, 30,000 pounds, at 4.3 cents	1,290
	3,310

2.—To rebuild A chamber No. 3.

Lead for chamber, 6 pounds, 45,000 pounds, at 5.05 cents	$2,360
Lumber, 12,000 feet, at $25	300
Labor, plumber, carpenter, and helpers	340
Gross cost	3,000
Deduct for old lead, 30,000 pounds, at 4.3 cents	1,300
Net cost	1,700

3.—Sundry damages and repairs.

Repairs to B and C Glovers	$200
Repairs to A, B, and C Gay-Lussac towers	450
Repairs to flues and kilns, A, B, and C	800
Windows, glass, and sashes	100
	1,250

4.—Total damages to acid plant at Hawkins Point, Anne Arundel County, as far as we are able to estimate at present time.

To Glover tower A	$3,310
To No. 3 chamber A	1,700
To sundry damages	1,250
Total	6,260

Loss in produce, 1,000 tons acid.

Following the practice, the Acting Secretary of War convened a board of Army officers to investigate the claim of the Davison Chemical Company, inviting the attention of the board to the statements of Col. D. H. Kinzie in his report heretofore set forth as follows:

"I believe it to be impossible for anyone not an expert to determine whether or not these damages were the result of the firing at Fort Armistead. * * * I believe that expert testimony is needed to obtain an accurate report on the matter."

And stating that—

"such expert services as may be necessary to determine whether or not the damage was caused by heavy firing—and if so, the extent and cost of such damage—should be employed to cooperate with the board in its investigation."

Accordingly a board was convened on September 29, 1903, consisting of Maj. John G. D. Knight, Corps of Engineers, General Staff; Maj. Medorem Crawford, Artillery Corps, and Capt. Hugh La F. Applewhite, Artillery Corps. The proceedings of the board are as follows:

"Proceedings of a board of officers convened at Fort McHenry, Md., pursuant to Special Orders No. 228, Headquarters Department of the East, current series, hereto attached:

FORT MCHENRY, MD., October 2, 1903.

The board met at Fort Armistead, Md., pursuant to telegraphic call of the senior member, at 11 a. m.

Present, all the members.

The board proceeded to the works of the Davison Chemical Company, adjoining the military reservation on the southwest. At the office it was joined by the president and superintendent of the works, the former having been notified of the intended meeting of the board.

The papers previously submitted by these gentlemen in support of the claim of the company were then reviewed in detail; after which the gentlemen and the board went through the works of the company, carefully inspected the same, and particularly inspected those parts claimed to have been damaged by the April firing of the 8-inch guns at Fort Armistead. There are no 10-inch guns at this post.

The board also observed from the upper stagings of the chemical works the relative position of the guns, the target, and the alleged damaged structures.

The board then returned to the office of the company, where it had further consultation with the officials; at the conclusion of which the president of the company, having been asked, stated that he had nothing further to lay before the board.

The board then proceeded to Fort McHenry, Md., for deliberation.

The line of direction of the fire at target practice in April last made an angle of about 25° to 30° with the longitudinal axes of the buildings.

In the sketch (inclosure 491789, A. G. O.—A), the towers marked GL, (Glover) should be lettered C, B, A from the fort outward, thereby enabling a better understanding of inclosure A.

A and C towers and chambers were reported to the board as being about three years old. B tower and chambers were bought by the company in about 1895, and the tower rebuilt in 1901.

There are two additional sets of towers and chambers, D and E, completed this year. All five are about of the same capacity, but the combined output of D and E was stated to be 60 per cent of the combined output of A, B, and C.

The superintendent claimed to have seen the lead walls of the gas chambers of series A actually open and close during the firing. The crowns of all the chambers are supported by rods from the roof trusses, and that of chamber 3, series A, is declared to have been loosened from its supports. Other damages specified in Inclosure A were explained.

The board deems it reasonable to attribute these to the firing, with the exception of the alleged damage to the foundations of the A Glover tower. This foundation is of solid brick masonry of about 11 by 11 feet on a side and 8 feet high. The superintendent claimed that its damage was due to acid leaking from the damaged tower which it supported. But this theory does not explain the several cracks which constitute the damage, and the solidity of the masonry will not justify the opinion that the cracks are due to jars of the guns.

The board is of the opinion that, omitting the item relating to "rebuilding A, Glover tower, bricks and labor, foundation, etc., $800," the items are reasonable both as to quantities and prices. The total amount of that claim thus approved by the board is $5,460, and to this extent the board is of the opinion that the Davison Chemical Company, of Baltimore, Md., has a valid claim for alleged damage to their property at Hawkins Point, Md., by the firing of 8-inch guns at Fort Armistead, Md., in April, 1903.

The board then, at 4 p. m., adjourned sine die.

JOHN G. D. KNIGHT,
Major, Corps of Engineers, General Staff.
M. CRAWFORD,
Major, Artillery Corps, Member.
H. LA F. APPLEWHITE,
Captain, Artillery Corps, Recorder.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE EAST,
Governors Island, N. Y., October 6, 1903.

Approved.
By command of Major-General Chaffee:
JOHN G. D. KNIGHT,
Major, Corps of Engineers, General Staff, Acting Adjutant-General.

On February 4, 1904, the Davison Chemical Company, by its attorney, submitted to the War Department an additional claim of $8,000 on account of additional injuries to its sulphuric-acid plant by the firing of high-power guns at Fort Armistead in April, 1903, stating that the company, in rebuilding its works, found that the cost thereof was greater than had been estimated, and that other damage than that already reported had been done, and that further rebuilding than that already done would be necessary.

The company also protested against future firing of guns at Fort Armistead.

The following is the statement of the superintendent of the Davison Chemical Company regarding the company's second claim:

BALTIMORE, MD., December 14, 1903.

GENTLEMEN: In my report of August 7, 1903, as to the damages done to our sulphuric acid plant at Hawkins Point, due to the firing of the big guns at Fort Armistead in April, 1903, you will note the following on page 2 of said report:

"In the same way, with much more damage, however, the curtains in the towers are torn and the packing of said towers is disarranged, with the result that the hot gases thereby attack the lead and cut it out. This damage is not apparent at once. It may take weeks or even months for this to show itself. Such is the character of the damage that has resulted from the firing in April. Our A Glover tower and chambers in A set we will have to shut down by October next so that the same may be rebuilt. I am in hopes that by repairing the other towers (viz, B and C) we can keep them going for some time yet; but I have already had to repair a slit 20 feet high on C Glover tower, and am afraid the interior packing of this is also damaged."

What I feared as to B and C towers at that time has proved to be correct within the past month. The draft on C Glover tower got very bad, and the lead collar at inlet of tower is nearly all gone; when we tried to repair it, found the brick lining was gone, shaken out by concussion of guns; also found the interior packing must be displaced, as the gases are retarded, and in trying to find an exit between lead and brick lining has eaten away the lead, that is very thin, and when it broke loose gas came out in great volume with pressure, showing the displacement is near bottom, as when open at top of towers. Gas comes out freely, also god draft at chambers, proving that the conditions are almost identical with that found at A Glover tower when we went to rebuild same. We have patched C tower as well as we can, but it must be rebuilt at as early a date as possible. The same conditions exist at B tower, though it has not showed up so bad yet; but the repairs we have had to make and are making prove that the firing damaged the three towers equally, and that we must prepare to rebuild B and C towers early in 1904, as they are liable to give way and shut us down unexpectedly at any time. In view of the contracts for all the acid we can possibly make in 1904, running 365 days and nights, you will readily see the serious position we are placed in.

The time shut down to rebuild A Glover tower and get plant into working order again was exactly six weeks, a loss of 1,400 tons of acid less made and a cost to rebuild tower alone, $5,212, being about $1,900 more than I claimed it would cost. This was due to more labor and increased cost of material than I estimated in claim. We ought to have made out claim for damages to the three towers, A, B, and C, but did not do so, as the damages were not so apparent at that time in B and C, and only made claim for that which we were able to prove at that time.

I therefore respectfully suggest that we make an additional claim for damages to B and C towers, due to the firing of guns at Fort Armistead, April, 1903, as follows:

Rebuild B and C Glover towers at Davison Chemical Company's works A, Hawkins Point, Anne Arundel County, Md., 1904.

ESTIMATE.

Lead, 84,000 pounds, at 5¼ cents per pound	$4,410
Chemical bricks, slabs, etc	1,300
Iron rods	100
Bricks, and lime and cement foundation	800
Lumber	400
Quartz, one-half can be used again, then 70 tons	350
Lead work, $600; brickwork, $700; carpenters, $300; laborers, $1,300	2,900
	10,260
Deduct for old lead, about 50,000 pounds, at 4½ cents	2,260
Cost to rebuild B and C Glover towers	8,000

Loss in acid manufacture while rebuilding, 2,800 tons.

The above figures are based upon actual figures in rebuilding A Glover tower.

Now, even if this claim for actual damages and loss to us should be allowed in addition to our claim on A tower, it is a serious question that confronts us at our Hawkins Point works, for, owing to the position of the guns at Fort Armistead, every time these guns are fired with usual charges in target practice our towers, being in direct range of these guns, will be damaged, as they were in April, 1903.

In view of these facts, and also that it is reported they are preparing for general target practice, with full war charges, next April (1904) at the forts, and, according to the Sun, are preparing to build an observation tower at Fort Armistead for this practice in April, I would respectfully suggest that this additional claim be presented to the War Department as early as possible, and a full statement of the exact facts, relating to our works and the continuous damages, whenever these guns are fired, be presented in a clear manner by some one thoroughly familiar with the facts, to the proper authority at the War Department at an early date, with a view to having some positive action taken by the War Department to prevent this damage and putting us to so much loss and delay to our business, as the damages we claim do not cover our actual loss by any means, even if we should get all we claim promptly, as no allowance is made for legal expenses and loss of interest on moneys paid out for rebuilding, besides loss to our customers by our inability to live up to our contracts, owing to these accidents.

I remain, yours, respectfully, JAMES MCNAB,
Superintendent Davison Chemical Works.

PRESIDENT AND BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF DAVISON CHEMICAL WORKS,
Baltimore, Md.

Summary of damages done to Davison Chemical Company's plant, Hawkins Point, Anne Arundel County, Md., A, B, and C Glover towers—No. 3 acid chambers and kilns.

Actual shortage on A Glover tower, etc., estimate	$1,902
Actual loss in production of acid during A repairs, estimated 1,000 tons, actual 1,400 tons of acid; actual cost to rebuild B and C towers based upon actual cost of A repairs, see estimate made December, 1903	8,000

Actual loss in production of acid during rebuilding of B and C towers, 2,800 tons.

NOTE.—It will be noted that I estimate cost of rebuilding B and C as slightly less than actually found in A tower.

Slightly less lead required per tower.
Slightly less bricks; foundation on one tower good.
Slightly less lumber; side lumber good on one tower.
Slightly less labor for lead burners, carpenters, bricklayers, and laborers.

Actual cost to rebuild A Glover tower, Hawkins Point, November, 1903.

Lead for tower and connections, 45,000 pounds, at 5.50 per pound	$2,475
Labor on lead work, had to hire extra man 42 days, at $7	600
Remmey acid-proof chemical bricks and slabs	640
Dietrich new iron rods	34
Lumber, $226; carpenters, $200	426
Bricks, 37,000, at $7	259
Bricklayers, foundations, packing tower, and kiln repairs	540
Baltimore Retort Company, fire bricks and fire clay	56
Maryland Lime and Cement Company, 50 barrels of cement	163
Hoyt Metal Company, metal, etc., for dampers	104
Quartz for towers to replace that broken in unloading	135
Laborers unloading and loading tower, helping lead workers, carpenters, and bricklayers	912
Gross cost	6,344
Deduct for old lead, 25,166 pounds, at 4½ cents	1,132
Net cost	5,212
Less estimated cost	3,310
Excess of cost over estimate	1,902

NOTE.—Price of lead increased after estimate made, also quantity; amount of labor much higher than estimated; amount of old lead received much less than estimated.

MARCH 4, 1904.

Notes on B and C Glover towers at Hawkins Point, damaged by firing of guns at Fort Armistead, April, 1903.

The A Glover tower was damaged so badly that it had to be entirely rebuilt in October, 1903.

The B and C Glovers have developed so many bad leaks and lead is getting so thin in places, owing to the displacement of the interior packing, allowing the hot gases to reach the lead, that we shall have to stop these towers some time this year and rebuild. We are trying to make them run as long as possible by patching lead work, as it will interfere very much with our contracts for acid to stop at this time; but they are liable to collapse at any time. Hence we are preparing to shut down by getting all materials needed at the works.

Inclosed find list of breaks and patches put on these towers since last April, and are repairing them every week.

Very respectfully, JAMES MCNAB,
Superintendent.

Repairs, B and C Glover towers, 1903–4.

C GLOVER.

The head collar where gas enters is gone, and has been patched several times. The brick lining of this collar was all jarred out of place.

Northeast corner: The upright seam split about 10 feet.
Northwest corner: Brick lining bulged out and lead destroyed.
Southeast corner: Brick lining bulged out and lead destroyed.
Southwest corner: Brick lining bulged out and lead destroyed.

On line of arch in interior packing and between the first and second timber cross brace, bad leaks. These leaks and the bad draft prove that packing has collapsed, and the gas not going its regular course is getting between the lead and brick casing. In this case it soon cuts and destroys the lead, the heat of the sulphurous gases being much greater than the melting point of the lead.

B GLOVER.

The head collar where gas enters is gone and has been patched several times, but it is now gone on the under side, where it is impossible to patch. The brick lining of this cellar has collapsed.

On the north, east, and south sides, between the first and second cross timbers brace, the brick packing bulged out and bad leaks, and lead has got very thin. This arch packing has collapsed, and draft is bad. We are repairing this tower every week.

C GAY-LUSSAC TOWER.

The head seams on this tower on northwest corner and northwest side were split for about 20 feet in length; also the corner of every chamber on top at crown plate, owing to the concussion and swing of the lead curtains.

JAS. MCNAB, Superintendent.

This claim also was referred to a board of Army officers, as had been the first claim, said board consisting of Col. Frank Thorp, Artillery Corps; Capt. Otho W. B. Farr, Artillery Corps, and Capt. Hugh La F. Applewhite, Artillery Corps.

This board's report is as follows:

Proceedings of a board of officers, convened at Fort Howard, Md., pursuant to the following order:

No. 11. } HEADQUARTERS ATLANTIC DIVISION,
GOVERNORS ISLAND,
SPECIAL ORDERS, } New York City, February 15, 1904.

[Extract.]

1. Under instructions from the War Department, dated February 13, 1904, a board of officers to consist of Col. Frank Thorp, Artillery Corps; Capt. Otho W. B. Farr, Artillery Corps; Capt. Hugh La F. Applewhite, Artillery Corps, is appointed to meet at Fort Howard, Md., as soon as practicable, at the call of the senior member, to examine into and report upon the validity of an additional claim of the Davison Chemical Company, of Baltimore, Md., for alleged damage to their property at Hawkins Point, Maryland, by the firing of 8-inch and 10-inch guns at Fort Armistead, Md., in April, 1903.

Upon completion of this duty the officers composing the board will return to their proper stations.

The travel enjoined is necessary for the public service.

* * * * * * *

By order of Major-General Corbin:

JOHN G. D. KNIGHT,
Major, General Staff, Chief of Staff.

FORT HOWARD, MD., February 20, 1904.

The board met at the call of the senior member at 2 p. m.

Present, all the members.

The board then carefully considered the additional claim of the Davison Chemical Company, as made in the letter of the superintendent herewith inclosed and marked "Encl. 1 to 491789, A. G. O." The claim was compared with the previous claim submitted by this company, and it was found that no part of the first claim is duplicated in the second.

In order to examine the alleged damage to the property by the firing of the 8-inch guns at Fort Armistead (there are no 10-inch guns at this post), the board adjourned to meet at the works of the Davison Chemical Company, Hawkins Point, Maryland, at 10, February 22, 1904. The president of the company was informed of this action and requested to be present, or designate some one to represent the company at the meeting of the board.

H. LA F. APPLEWHITE,
Captain, Artillery Corps, Recorder.

FORT HOWARD, MD., February 27, 1904.

The board met at the call of the senior member at 9 a. m.

Present, all the members.

The board was unable to meet on the 22d instant, owing to the fact that the Government boat (upon which the members were dependent for transportation) was unable to run on account of the ice and fog prevailing on the river. After that date, a meeting could not be held sooner, owing to the absence of the senior member on duty as a member of a general court-martial at Fort Monroe, Va.

The board then proceeded to Hawkins Point, Maryland, to the works of the Davison Chemical Company. Upon arriving at that place it was found that there was no representative of the company present to appear before the board. A letter had been addressed to the company, informing it of the intention of the board to visit the works of the company, but owing to delay in delivery of the letter no representative of the company was able to reach the works within a reasonable time to appear before the board.

The board therefore adjourned to meet at the call of the senior member.

H. LA F. APPLEWHITE,
Captain, Artillery Corps, Recorder.

FORT ARMISTEAD, MD., March 3, 1904.

The board met at the call of the senior member at 10.30 a. m.

Present, all the members.

The board then proceeded to the works of the Davison Chemical Company, which adjoins the reservation of Fort Armistead, Md. The president of the company had been previously informed of the intended meeting of the board, and upon the arrival of the board at the works it was joined by the president and superintendent of the company.

These gentlemen explained in detail to the board the construction of the Glover towers, the effect of the firing upon the towers, the repairs which it had been necessary to make—explaining the paper which had been submitted in support of the additional claim. The drawing hereto appended and marked "A" shows the construction of the towers, and the notes of the superintendent, appended thereto, show the repairs that have been made and the extent of the damage. The superintendent explained, in connection with their claim, the condition in which A Glover tower—which was examined by a previous board—had been found when torn down in October, 1903, the condition of the lead lining and the foundation—explaining in this connection that the acid which had escaped had leaked down through the foundation, thereby rendering many of the bricks of the foundation unfit for use and so weakening the foundation as to render it necessary to rebuild it.

Accompanied by the superintendent, the board then made a careful examination of the towers to which the alleged damage had been done, special attention being paid to the parts where the gas had eaten its way through the lead. It was found that the lead collar around the pipe leading from the furnace into the towers (both B and C) had given way and had been repeatedly patched. The condition of B collar appeared to be the worse. There were numerous other patches on the lead towers, most of them a short distance above the first purline, nearly all of which had been made within the past two or three months.

The board then returned to the office, and the president and superintendent stated that they had nothing further to submit to the board.

The board then at 11.45 a. m. proceeded to Fort Howard, Md., for deliberation.

The location of the chemical works with reference to the guns at Fort Armistead, Md., and the line of fire at the target practice in April, 1903, have been explained in the report of the board of officers which acted upon the first claim of this company.

In the opinion of the board damage was done to both B and C Glover towers by the firing of the 8-inch guns at Fort Armistead, Md., in April, 1903. The exact extent of this damage can not be determined until the towers are torn down, but the nature of the damage is such that it is only a question of time when the towers must be torn down and rebuilt. As shown by the visible results, the damage done is evidently as claimed by the company; and in the opinion of the board the claim of the company is reasonable both as to quantities and to prices. The board approves the entire claim for damages ($8,000), and to this extent it is of the opinion that the Davison Chemical Company has a valid additional claim for alleged damage done their property at Hawkins Point, Maryland, by the firing of the 8-inch guns at Fort Armistead, Md., in April, 1903.

There being no further business before it, the board, at 1 p. m., adjourned sine die.

An estimate for the payment of the two claims of the Davison Chemical Company, aggregating $13,460, as found due by the two boards of Army officers referred to, was transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of War April 6, 1904, of which the following is a copy:

"Estimates of appropriations required for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, by the Secretary of War.

"WAR DEPARTMENT.

"MISCELLANEOUS.

"Payment of damages to private property by gun firing, etc.—
For payment to the Davison Chemical Company, of Baltimore, Md., for damages to their sulphuric acid plant, located at Hawkins Point, Maryland, by reason of the firing of high-power guns at Fort Armistead, Md., in April, 1903 (submitted)..... $13,460

"NOTE.—The above amount constitutes the sum total of two claims presented to the Department by the Davison Chemical Company for damages to their sulphuric acid plant, as stated above.

"On August 7, 1903, this company claimed the sum of $6,260 as total damages to their plant, as far as could be ascertained at that time, this amount being itemized as follows: To rebuild Glover tower A, $3,310; to rebuild No. 3 chamber A, $1,700; and to sundry damages and repairs, $1,250, each of these three features of the claim being itemized in detail.

"In accordance with departmental usage, a board of officers was convened to personally examine into and report upon the claim. The board found that, omitting an item amounting to $800 for damages to foundation of Glover tower A, the balance of the claim, amounting to $5,460, was well founded, and that 'to this extent the board is of the opinion that the Davison Chemical Company, of Baltimore Md., has a valid claim for alleged damage to their property at Hawkins Point, Maryland, by the firing of 8-inch guns at Fort Armistead, Md., in April, 1903.' The finding this board was approved by the commanding general, Department of the East, October 6, 1903.

"On February 4, 1904, the company presented an additional claim for $8,000 with the statement that its prior claim was made as explicit as it was possible to make it at that time, the superintendent of the company suggesting that the injuries complained of were difficult of detection at once and until the fires could be drawn and the towers examined the extent of the damage would not be fully known. The company therefore claimed an additional amount of $8,000 for rebuilding Glover towers B and C.

"Another board of officers was convened to consider this claim, careful instructions being given that the fullest comparison should be made with the prior claim to prevent any duplication in the award of damages. This board found that damage was done both to B and C Glover towers by the firing of 8-inch guns at Fort Armistead, Md., in April, 1903; that 'The exact extent of this damage can not be determined until the towers are torn down, but the nature of the damage is such that it is only a question of time when the towers must be torn down and rebuilt. As shown by the visible results, the damage done is evidently as claimed by the company, and in the opinion of the board the claim of the company is reasonable both as to quantities and to prices. The board approves the entire claim for damages ($8,000), and to this extent it is of the opinion that the Davison Chemical Company has a valid additional claim for damage done their property at Hawkins Point, Maryland, by the firing of the 8-inch guns at Fort Armistead, Md., in April, 1903.'

"In view of the painstaking investigation made of the two claims by these boards of officers, the total amount, $13,460, found by them as the aggregate damages sustained by this company is recommended by the Department to the favorable consideration of Congress."

Your committee append hereto an itemized sworn statement of Mr. John Luntz, secretary and treasurer of the Davison Chemical Company, showing the total cost of reconstruction of the towers and kilns at said company's plant, and also a sworn statement of Mr. George R. Tyrrell, the contractor who reconstructed said towers and kilns.

The evidence in this case, herein set forth, is conclusive to the minds of your committee that in April, 1903, by reason of the firing of high-power guns upon the Government reservation known as Fort Armistead, in Anne Arundel County, Md., three towers known as Glover towers A, B, and C, also eight kilns, were injured by the concussion of said guns to such an extent as to render the said towers and kilns unfit for the manufacture of sulphuric acid, and that said towers and kilns had to be rebuilt and were rebuilt at the expense of the Davison Chemical Company, in amount $15,456.82, a sum in excess of the total claims of said company.

Similar claims have been reported from time to time by the Secretary of War, a number of which were paid under the provisions of an act of Congress approved February 24, 1905, public act 99, third session

Fifty-eighth Congress, page 68, but for some reason, without prejudice to the claim of the Davison Chemical Company, its claim was not included among those for which appropriation was made at that time.

We therefore think it just that this claim should be paid, as recommended by two boards of Army officers, and the passage of the bill is recommended.

BALTIMORE, MD., February 16, 1906.

I, John Luntz, secretary and treasurer of the Davison Chemical Company, make oath that the following statement is correct, and that the sum total of said statement, $15,456.82, has been paid by me to this date for reconstruction of towers and kilns at the Hawkins Point plant which were damaged by the firing of high-pressure guns at Fort Armistead in April, 1903:

Bricks	$860.45
Chemical bricks	2,268.97
Lead	2,137.26
Lumber	54.95
Cement	228.70
Sundries	79.97
Labor	9,826.52
	15,456.82

Respectfully submitted.

[L. S.] JOHN LUNTZ,
Secretary and Treasurer.

STATE OF MARYLAND, City of Baltimore, to wit:

On this 16th day of February, 1906, before me came John Luntz, to me well known, and known to me to be the secretary and treasurer of the Davison Chemical Company, of Baltimore city, Md., and made oath in due form of law that he is the secretary and treasurer of said Davison Chemical Company; and that the aforegoing statement by him signed as such officer is just, true, and correct.

Witness my hand and notarial seal.

[L. S.] FELIX R. SULLIVAN,
Notary Public and United States Customs Notary.

My commission expires in May, 1906.

I, George R. Tyrrell, being duly sworn, depose and say that I am a resident of the city of Baltimore, Md.; that I make a specialty of the construction of chemical plants for the manufacture of sulphuric acid; that I was engaged by the Davison Chemical Company, of Baltimore city, Md., and did contract with said company for the construction of three towers at said company's plant, located at Hawkins Point, Anne Arundel County, Md., said towers being designated as A, B, and C Glover towers, which were damaged by reason of the firing of high-pressure guns at Fort Armistead, in close vicinity to said plant; that between the dates of October 26, 1903, and December 1, 1903, I reconstructed A tower, aforesaid; that between the dates of September 17, 1904, and November 12, 1904, I reconstructed B tower, aforesaid; that between the dates of October 7, 1904, and December 6, 1904, I reconstructed C tower, aforesaid.

I further depose and say that of my own personal knowledge and experience the life of a Glover tower, properly cared for, is twenty years; and that I originally constructed the A and B towers in 1895 and the C tower in 1898.

GEORGE R. TYRRELL.

PUBLIC EDUCATION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] desires to make a request, and I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. BURKETT. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 4032) to establish the direction and control of public education in the District of Columbia be set down for consideration on Wednesday morning, immediately after the routine business.

Mr. KEAN. I trust that will not be done. I object.

Mr. BURKETT. Then I should like to give notice that on Wednesday morning, after the routine business, I am going to move to take up the bill.

OCEAN MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask that Senate bill No. 28 be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays the bill before the Senate.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 28) to amend the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports and to promote commerce."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when the shipping bill was before the Senate during the last session I presented and had printed a large number of resolutions adopted by various trade and commercial organizations in the country in favor of that bill. I have recently had handed me resolutions adopted by the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, the Spokane Chamber of Commerce, the Louisville Board of Trade, the Commercial Club of Topeka, Kans., the New York Chamber of Commerce, and the Indianapolis Board of Trade, in support of the bill which is now under consideration. I ask that these resolutions be printed, without reading, as a part of my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolutions are as follows:

Resolutions adopted by Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, November 5, 1907.

Whereas the industrial interests of Cincinnati, as well as other localities, are largely affected by transportation and mail facilities with foreign countries incident to the great extent of export business in lines of manufactures and otherwise; and

Whereas the feature of time and of frequency in the transmission of communications upon which business interests are dependent is one of especial importance, so that whatever may serve to lessen the period of time necessary to consummate such communication by mail facilities has a direct bearing upon the industrial interests of our locality and of the country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That to the end of securing facility for more frequent mail communication between the United States and South American ports the rate of pay for ocean mail service now provided for ships of the first class, under the act of March 3, 1891, not to exceed $4 a mile, shall be applicable to ships of the second class, now allowed a rate of $2 a mile, which rate for ships of the second class has failed to induce the needful mail service from them: Therefore

Resolved by the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, That Congress be urged to authorize the Postmaster-General, at his discretion, to apply to ships of the second class the same rate of mail pay provided for ships of the first class when such allowance to second-class ships will secure extension of mail facilities with South American and oriental ports.

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, to the Postmaster-General, to the Secretary of State, and to each Congressman from Ohio, and that said Members of Congress be, and are hereby, earnestly requested to use their best endeavors to secure the legislation suggested in these resolutions.

Resolutions adopted by Spokane Chamber of Commerce December 10, 1907.

Resolved by the board of trustees and members assembled of the Spokane Chamber of Commerce, That we most heartily indorse the sentiments expressed by the Merchant Marine League of the United States relative to the vital need of national legislation to encourage the building of merchant ships by American capital and the manning of same by American seamen.

The lack of American owned and manned freight-carrying ocean vessels, if allowed to continue, would be a menace to our naval efficiency in time of war. We believe that Government aid, properly safeguarded, is imperative if the commercial life of the nation is to reach its fullest development.

Resolutions adopted by Louisville Board of Trade December 11, 1907.

Resolved by the board of directors of the Louisville Board of Trade, That Congress be urged to pass the amendment to the ocean-mail act of 1891, recommended by the President, authorizing the Postmaster-General, within the restriction and obligations of the act, to contract with steamers with a speed of 16 knots or over, for transportation of mails to South America and oriental ports, at a rate not to exceed $4 per mile.

Resolved further, That copies of the resolution be forwarded to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, to the Secretary of State, to the Postmaster-General, and to the Senators and Representatives from Kentucky, asking them to use their best efforts to secure the legislation desired.

Resolution adopted by Commercial Club of Topeka, Kans., December 17, 1907.

Resolved by the Commercial Club of Topeka, Kans., That we are in favor of national legislation for the upbuilding of our shipping communication with foreign countries, as advocated by the Merchant Marine League of the United States, and that we specially favor swift and regular American ocean mail lines to South America and the Orient, and that the rates of compensation for ships of speed suitable for South American and Orient service be so increased that American merchants can ship American-made goods on vessels as good as those now run from Europe under the mail pay of European Governments.

Resolutions adopted by New York Chamber of Commerce January 2, 1908.

Whereas the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York on December 6, 1906, expressed itself in favor of the payment of a liberal postal subsidy for the establishment of quick, frequent, and direct mail communication with the countries of South America as one of the elements of importance in the promotion of commercial intercourse with these countries: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the Chamber approve of the bills S. 28, introduced by Mr. GALLINGER, and H. R. 4068, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY, authorizing the Postmaster-General to pay for ocean mail service, under the act of March 3, 1891, in vessels of the second class on routes across the Pacific Ocean, or to ports of the South Atlantic, 4,000 miles or more in length, outward voyage, at a rate per mile not exceeding the rate applicable to vessels of the first class, as provided in said act.

Resolutions adopted by Indianapolis Board of Trade November 21, 1907.

Whereas the industrial interests of Indianapolis, as well as other localities, are largely affected by transportation and mail facilities with foreign countries incident to the great extent of export manufactures and otherwise; and

Whereas the feature of time and frequency in the transmission of communications upon which business interests are dependent is one of especial importance, so that whatever may serve to lessen the period of time necessary to consummate such communications by mail facilities has a direct bearing upon the industrial interests of our locality and of the country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That to the end of securing facility for more frequent mail communication between the United States, South American, and oriental ports the rate of pay for ocean mail service now provided for ships of the first class, under the act of March 3, 1891, not to exceed $4 a mile, shall be applicable to ships of the second class, now allowed a rate of $2 per mile, which rate for ships of the second class has failed to induce the needful mail service for them: Therefore

Resolved by the Indianapolis Board of Trade, That Congress be urged to authorize the Postmaster-General, at his discretion, to apply to ships of the second class the same rate of mail pay provided for ships of the first class when such allowance to second-class ships will secure extension of mail facilities with South American and oriental ports.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, to the Postmaster-General, to the Secretary of State, and to each Congressman from Indiana, and that said Members of Congress be, and are hereby, earnestly requested to use their best endeavors to secure legislation suggested in these resolutions.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when the shipping bill of the last Congress was defeated by a filibuster I closed the debate in these words:

I want here and now to give notice to my associates in this Chamber that so long as I am privileged to remain in public life I shall not be quiescent while this condition of things exists, but in the future I will exert myself to the utmost to secure legislation on this most important subject. I am gratified to have assurances from certain Senators on the other side of the Chamber that they will cooperate with those of us on this side who desire legislation in bringing about the passage of a bill on substantially the same lines upon which the bill under consideration is framed. I have hopes of a satisfactory result in the next Congress, and I know that I shall have the cooperation of some distinguished Senators who have heretofore been in opposition in securing the passage of wise and just legislation for the purpose of rehabilitating the American merchant marine.

When those words were spoken we were considering a bill that had passed the Senate and had been amended by the House of Representatives, the amendments making it substantially an ocean mail bill. The bill fell far short of meeting my views, but it seemed to be all that could possibly then be secured, and I am persuaded that nothing further can be hoped for at present. Believing that to be so I presented a bill early in this session providing a change in the ocean mail act of 1891 which, in my judgment, will establish satisfactory steamship communication between this country and South America, and also across the Pacific Ocean to the Philippines, China, Japan, and Australasia. The bill, as amended by the Committee on Commerce, reads as follows:

That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to pay for ocean mail service under the act of March 3, 1891, in vessels of the second class on routes to South America, to the Philippines, to Japan, to China, and to Australasia, 4,000 miles or more in length, outward voyage, at a rate per mile not exceeding the rate applicable to vessels of the first class as provided in said act.

The present compensation to mail vessels of the first class (20-knot steamships) is $4 per mile for the outward voyage, and to second-class steamships (16 knots and less than 20) $2 per mile. Under this law it has been impossible to maintain lines of steamships across the Pacific Ocean and to South America, which condition will be remedied by the proposed change in the law. When the bill of 1891 passed the Senate a more liberal compensation was provided for second-class steamships, but it was amended by the other House to the rates now allowed, which have proved, as was predicted at the time, inadequate for the purpose.

In his annual message to the two Houses of Congress at the beginning of the present session the President warmly advocated legislation along the lines now contemplated, and the Postmaster-General and the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor strongly approve of the bill now under consideration. Secretary of State Root has also convincingly pointed out the inadequacy of our mail service to South American countries. (See report of Senate Committee on Commerce, made February 3, 1908.)

The bill raises no new issue, introduces no new principle. It leaves existing and prosperous steamship services exactly as they are now, and without changing one iota the tried and approved methods of the present law increases the compensation on routes which seventeen years of experience have conclusively proved to be inadequate—the long, costly, and important routes to South America and the Orient, the routes where our lack of steamship service is severest, and our need of such service most imperative.

A DEPLORABLE CONDITION.

Not one American steamship of any kind now runs to Brazil or Argentina or Chile or Peru. An American mail service to those southern countries is absolutely nonexistent. Not one American steamship now runs from either our Atlantic or our Pacific coast to Australasia. The mail service to both of these continents must be created from the very beginning. Five American steamers of the Pacific Mail now run across the Pacific to Japan and China, but only one of these goes regularly to the Philippines. One American steamer of the Great Northern Company, and two of the Boston Steamship Company run from Puget Sound to Japan, China, and occasionally to the Philippines, but it is understood that two, if not three, of these vessels are for sale, and that at any time, unless relief is given to them, the service may be totally abandoned. The general manager of the Pacific Mail Company stated before the Society of Naval Architects and Marine Engineers a few weeks ago that the fifty-year-old charter of his company, soon to expire, might be surrendered, and the line withdrawn within a twelvemonth.

Last March there were fifteen American steamships plying across the Pacific Ocean. Now only eight are left. Since the shipping bill of the last Congress was defeated almost one-half of our feeble American Pacific naval reserve has disappeared, and when Admiral Evans steers up through the Golden Gate from the Straits of Magellan we shall have the grotesque disproportion in the Pacific of two battle ships to every commercial vessel engaged in foreign trade—a sight which has never yet been seen beneath the sun.

And unless the new shipping bill is speedily passed, we shall see an even more grotesque disproportion than that—sixteen battle ships and not one commercial steamer in the Pacific away from the ports of the United States—for the remnant of our merchant marine in that mighty ocean is now facing the absolute extinction which long since overtook our commercial fleet on the routes to South America.

I am confident, however, that there will be a strong, patriotic majority in both Houses of Congress to sustain the new legislation which is proposed, and which the business interests of the entire country so eagerly and unitedly support. This bill, so brief and yet so potent, will save and strengthen our Pacific lines of communication, and create new lines to the Southern Hemisphere. I predict that if it becomes a law it will promptly establish a line from the Atlantic coast to Brazil, another line to Argentina, a line from the South Atlantic or Gulf coast to South America, and similar communication in the Pacific Ocean. It can do substantially all this for an expenditure not exceeding three or four million dollars a year, about half of what England and France now pay for their steamship service, less than what Japan pays, and no more than the present annual net profit derived by the Treasury from the now meager and unsatisfactory ocean mail service of the United States. The British postmaster-general puts the British loss on the foreign transportation of British mails at about $2,000,000 annually, while in the last fiscal year we made a profit of $3,600,000 on the carriage of our foreign mails. Why should not at least this amount be expended in a way to encourage the building of American ships for the foreign trade? And while we would thus be building up our commercial facilities, we would at the same time be adding to the naval strength of the Republic.

THE LOST AUSTRALIAN LINE.

Let us see what has happened since the defeat of the shipping bill last March.

In the first place, on March 9, five days after the adjournment of Congress, the Oceanic Steamship Company of San Francisco notified the Post-Office Department that it should withdraw its line to Australasia. This line had been operating under the ocean mail law of 1891, and after five years of trial had found the rate of compensation for 16-knot steamers utterly inadequate on the long and costly route of 8,329 statute miles from the Golden Gate via Hawaii far down across the South Pacific to Samoa, New Zealand, and Australia. The requirements of the mail contracts were such that the Oceanic steamers were forced to attempt to make a speed beyond their capacity over such a vast distance, a speed higher than that exacted over so long a route anywhere else in the world. And for this difficult and expensive service, this American company, employing well-paid American officers and crews, was given a compensation by the United States of only $16,659 a voyage, as compared with $41,604 given by Germany to the Australian liners of the North German Lloyd, $47,814 given by France to the French liners, $21,917 given by Japan to her Yokohama ships, and $23,077 by Great Britain to the Orient liners—all manned at half the cost, or less, of the American vessels, and allowed to proceed at lower speed.

In pursuance of the notification, the three Oceanic liners were taken off the route, their officers and crews dismissed, and the three ships dismantled and laid up in the Bay of San Francisco, where they now are. One of the three American steamship lines crossing the Pacific Ocean has thus absolutely disappeared since Congress adjourned last spring, our flag has vanished from the commercial routes of the South Pacific, our only communication with our naval station and garrison in Samoa is cut off, and three of the best passenger, mail, and freight ships are eliminated from the traffic between American Hawaii and the mainland of the United States. At a time when the thoughts of the American people and their Government are turning as never before to the Pacific Ocean and its commercial and political mastery, these things are happening, and three of the swiftest of our auxiliary cruisers in that ocean—ships built on especial designs approved by the Navy Department—are hauled up to rust at their anchors, while their brave officers and sailors, of whom there may at any time be imperative need, are sent over the side and told that there is no employment, no livelihood, for them under the flag of their country.

Meanwhile the business men of the United States wishing to communicate by mail with the energetic and prosperous merchants of Auckland and Sydney and the other commercial centers of the South Seas, have got to send their letters by a roundabout route in some British or Canadian steamer, subsidized with the direct understanding that its owners shall discriminate in every way possible against American trade and in favor of the trade of Great Britain and Canada. You can imagine what, under such circumstances, is likely to become of the export commerce of the United States to Australasia, built up in a few years from $12,000,000 to $29,000,000 a year, very largely by the direct communication afforded by this Oceanic Line, now abandoned by its government and driven from the seas.

TO SOUTH AMERICA VIA EUROPE.

One thing more has happened which ought to open the eyes of the American people. Soon after the bill of last winter was defeated the Post-Office Department was compelled to notify American business men that hereafter the United States mails for South Brazil and Argentina would have to be dispatched by way of Europe. There are fast ships running across the North Atlantic. There are fast foreign lines, all subsidized or aided in some other way, from Great Britain and the Continent direct to South America. The Post-Office Department has actually found that a more regular and efficient mail service may be secured by sending letters 3,000 miles across the Atlantic to Europe, and then across the Atlantic again to Rio de Janeiro and Buenos Ayres, than by way of the slow, irregular, uncertain foreign "tramps" that occasionally sail from New York for South America.

Now, the North Atlantic ports of the United States are as near to Brazil and Argentina as are Liverpool, or Southampton, or London, or Hamburg, or Cherbourg. A fast American steamship service would enable American business men to have their letters and goods delivered in South American ports as quickly and regularly as are now the letters and goods of their European competitors—indeed, more quickly, for the ocean mail bill before Congress last spring and the bill before Congress now provides for American steamships faster on the average than those which Europe now sends out to South America.

But under this present arrangement—the direct result of the defeat of the shipping bill last March—American business men are 3,000 miles farther off from South American markets than their rivals of England, France, and Germany. American mails or American goods destined for the chief markets of South America, and sent via Europe, have to be sent a week or ten days ahead of European mail or European goods to secure equally prompt delivery—and this is true whether they are sent via Europe twice across the Atlantic, or from our ports direct in such poor apologies for steamships as the European shipping combinations may see fit to put upon the route from New York to South America.

With our commercial mails going out via Europe, there must also go in the same way, in subsidized auxiliary cruisers of foreign governments, the confidential dispatches of our Department of State to its representatives in the South American Republics, and the confidential instructions of the Navy Department to our admirals and captains on the South American coasts. Such a thing as this, as the Postmaster-General pointed out a year ago in his annual report, is contrary to the public interest—and it is a great deal worse than that. The great battleship fleet of the United States, now on its way toward San Francisco, will find the Stars and Stripes almost unrecognized and unknown in the great ports of our sister nations of the southern hemisphere. Our consul-general at Rio de Janeiro, in a report of March 18, 1907, declares that out of a thousand steamers of a total of 2,468,000 tons that entered the chief port and capital of Brazil last year, not one flew the American colors, and our consul-general at Buenos Ayres in a report of May 20, 1907, states that two thousand steamers of a total of 4,227,000 tons entered the chief port of Argentina last year, and that "The American flag is not mentioned in the returns!" And what a commentary it is on our present condition on the seas, and what a reproach it is to the American nation, that Secretary of State Root, on his recent visit to South America, found it necessary to go in a battle ship instead of a commercial steamship.

A prominent American, who recently had occasion to go to Valparaiso on important business, a gentleman well known to many members of this body, in a letter thus describes the poor service furnished by foreign vessels to South America:

> The first steamer sailed from New York on September 7, and I reached Colon on September 16. The first steamer leaving Panama sailed on the 21st. You may understand the annoyance to which I was subjected when I state that I was from September 21 until October 17, twenty-seven days, in going to Valparaiso, a distance in round numbers of 3,000 miles. I was forty-one days from New York to Valparaiso. The accommodations are wretchedly inferior for passenger and mail service on the Pacific coast between Panama and Valparaiso. There are two steamship companies that control the traffic, the South American Steamship Company (Chilean) and The Pacific Steam Navigation Company (British). The companies have formed a combination, and they offer the poorest kind of service. In 1889, when I first came to this coast, the trip from Panama to Callao was made regularly in nine days, and now it takes from fourteen to sixteen. Many of the same steamers are still in commission, and naturally they are old, dirty, and inconvenient, besides overburdened with traffic. Freight and passenger business on the line has doubled, I am told, in the last five years, and rates have also increased. It now costs $210 American money for a ticket from Panama to Valparaiso, whereas the price fifteen years ago was $150. Both companies have so much trade that they can not handle it and seem to be incapable of improving the service. Both are getting enormous profits, and yet do not offer to the public as good accommodations as they did fifteen years ago. When I went to the United States last May, I took an English ship, the Oransa, that went south to the Straits of Magellan, through the Straits to the Atlantic, and thence to Liverpool. Afterwards I sailed from Southampton for New York, and I made the entire trip, a distance of 13,000 miles, in exactly forty-one days. By a strange coincidence, it took me exactly the same time, forty-one days, to come from New York to Valparaiso, a distance of 5,000 miles. The route via Europe was in clean, up-to-date steamers that wasted no time. The west-coast trip was in very inferior steamers that made more than twenty stops, sometimes for three days at a time, for the purpose of picking up cargo. I can not too strongly urge the necessity of some movement that will result in better steamship facilities on the coast. Improvement in American trade in these countries is practically impossible under present circumstances. If a good line of American steamers can be put on this route it will revolutionize conditions and bear rich fruit for American interests.

In view of these facts, need we wonder that in spite of the Monroe doctrine we are being quietly shouldered out of the South American republics by other peoples whose governments understand the intimate relations between ships and trade? Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Spain, have long had their own steamship lines to South American markets. Japan had no sooner closed her victorious war with Russia than she subsidized into existence a steamship line across the Pacific to Peru and Chile, and our consuls note that this is about to be extended to Argentina and Brazil. What a mockery of fate it is that the people of a hermit nation, which the United States sixty years ago first opened and introduced to the modern world, should now be able to boast better, more regular, and more direct shipping facilities of their own to South America than are provided for the manufacturers and merchants of the United States.

Nor is Japan alone in a new reaching out for the markets of South America. Portugal, since last spring, has taken steps to subsidize a new trans-Atlantic line. France has started a new line into the Caribbean. Canada now gives subsidies to her own lines down both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of Mexico, one condition being that they shall take no goods from American ports. Even little Norway and Sweden are starting their own Latin-American steamship services by national aid, and on October 11 last the Lower House of the Dutch States-General passed a bill providing for a subvention for a Dutch steamship line to Brazil and Argentina.

Meanwhile the Government of the United States, with more natural right to dominant trade and influence in South America than all these little nations and all the great nations of Europe combined, signalizes its impotence by throwing up its hands and ordering that its commercial and Government mails be sent out to South America via Europe!

FOREIGNERS COALING THE BATTLE FLEET.

And this is not the worst. The most smarting and humiliating episode of the entire year is the revelation which the Pacific cruise of the great battle-ship fleet is affording, that our merchant marine is now shrunk to such a skeleton that it does not contain enough ocean-going steam colliers to provide the indispensable fuel for our battle ships on their voyage from the American port of Hampton Roads to the American port of San Francisco. We have barges and coasters, hundreds of them, but almost no deep-water freight ships of the kind requisite to accompany and supply a battle-ship fleet. So the Navy Department has reluctantly chartered foreign steamers to perform this national service, and to the humiliation of the absence of our own commercial flag from the ports of South America which the battle-ship fleet will visit is added the humiliation of the presence there of these attendant colliers, flying the flags and manned by the subjects of European governments.

But it should be said in all justice to the Navy Department and the National Administration that for this humiliation they can not be blamed. The President in his messages and other public declarations has set forth clearly and forcibly the imperative need of a merchant marine as a naval reserve, and so in his annual report has every Secretary of the Navy for a long term of years. It is not the Executive nor the Navy Department, but Congress, that is responsible for this deplorable condition.

Moreover, this significant fact should be borne well in mind, that though we can use foreign colliers to supply our fighting Navy in time of peace, we could not do so in actual war. The laws of neutrality would forbid the borrowing of foreign ships and foreign crews, and even if secured, these foreign ships and crews could not be trusted to perform loyal and efficient service.

We discovered this fact in the war with Spain, when foreign ships which we had managed to secure at a tremendous price before the outbreak of hostilities were promptly deserted by their officers and men, and the ships could not be employed to carry coal or anything else until they were turned over to Americans. If there were war now instead of peace, our lack of colliers manned by our own people under our own flag might fatally delay or absolutely prevent the transfer of the battleship fleet from the Atlantic to meet an enemy sweeping down upon the Philippines, Hawaii, Puget Sound, and San Francisco. If we were once face to face with this calamity, the record of the votes in Congress upon successive bills to protect the merchant marine and create a naval reserve would tell an illuminating story to the whole American people.

PRESENT CONTRACT LINES.

Besides the payment of $1,481,915.86 to American steamships under contract, the Post-Office Department paid to noncontract American steamships the sum of $247,834.47, at the rate prescribed by law, which is $1.60 a pound for letters. These noncontract American steamships run principally to Caribbean ports and across the Pacific Ocean.

The American contract lines operating under the law of 1891 received compensation in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1906, as follows:

American Line to Europe	$762,638.40
Oceanic Line to Australasia	249,885.00
Oceanic Line to Tahiti and Marquesas Islands	42,180.00
Ward Line to Cuba and Mexico	203,282.00
Red D Line to Venezuela	109,155.80
American Mail Line to Jamaica	114,774.66
Total	1,481,915.86

The American Line to Europe operates 20-knot steamers of the first class, and receives a compensation of $4 a statute mile for each outward voyage.

The Oceanic Line to Australasia, which has suspended its service because of inadequate compensation, operated 16-knot steamers of the second class, and received $2 a mile outward. The Oceanic company operates third-class steamers of 14 knots on the route to Tahiti and the Marquesas Islands, and receives $1 a mile.

The Ward Line to Cuba and Mexico operates 17 and 18 knot steamers of the second class, but receives only the third-class mail pay of $1 a mile.

The Red D Line to Venezuela operates 14-knot steamers of the third class and 12-knot steamers of the fourth class, and receives $1 a mile for its 14-knot steamers and 66⅔ cents a mile for its 12-knot steamers.

The American Mail Line to Jamaica operates 15-knot steamers of the third class, but receives only pay for the fourth class, or 66⅔ cents a mile.

WHAT WOULD BE SAVED.

The Post-Office Department, in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1906, paid the sum of $28,671.03 to foreign steamers, most of them slow and unfit for mail service, and run on irregular schedules from ports of the United States to Brazil, Argentina and other South American countries. This is payment for a slow, uncertain, wretchedly inefficient and unsatisfactory service in foreign vessels, mostly of the "tramp" type, which would not be allowed to carry the mails of their own European governments, a service seriously hampering our trade and discrediting our Government in South America. Besides this sum a considerable amount, not now separately stated in the post-office returns, is paid for the carrying of our mails to Europe, and their dispatch thence by subsidized European lines to Brazil and Argentina, thus crossing the ocean twice to reach their destination.

On the Pacific Ocean the Post-Office Department in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1906, paid to a few noncontract American steamships for carrying the mails to the Orient the sum of $114,250.72. To foreign steamers on the Pacific, for carrying our mails to the Orient, the Post-Office Department paid in the same year the sum of $40,932.95—most of these foreign steamships being, in addition, generously subsidized by their own governments. Thus the Japanese line to Seattle receives a subsidy of $327,015 a year, and the Japanese line to San Francisco, $506,940. Besides, the Post-Office Department is now paying a considerable amount, not separately specified, to the Canadian-Pacific line, under the British flag from Vancouver to the Orient, which receives a subsidy of $300,000 a year, and to the Union Steamship Company of New Zealand (British) from Vancouver to Australasia, which receives a subsidy of $321,189.

Most of the sums of money now expended for carrying the mails in foreign steamships to South America and in noncontract American and foreign steamships across the Pacific Ocean would be saved by the passage of this bill and the establishment of superior American mail lines to those countries. We should get a great deal better service for the money. For example, 16-knot American steamships to South America from our Atlantic or Gulf coast should deliver our mails in 15 days at Rio Janeiro and 18 days at Buenos Ayres, while the slow foreign "tramps" now employed take 25 or 30 days or even more for the same voyages. Some of the ships of foreign registry now carrying our mail on the Pacific are of 14 knots or even 12 knots.

Moreover, all experience shows that an improved mail service soon brings increased returns in an expanded commerce and growing postal receipts. Thus, our long-established 20-knot American contract line to Europe, in the fiscal year 1906, received, under its contract, a compensation of $762,638.40, at the rate of $4 an outward mile. But these ships carried so much mail that if they had been paid at the regular weight rate they would have received $910,542.48. In other words, this 20-knot line of weekly mail steamers actually returned a profit to the Government of $147,904.08, this being the excess of the sea and inland postage over the cost of the contract service.

In the fiscal year ended June 30, 1902, the postage received by the Government on the mails carried under contract by the Oceanic Line to Australasia amounted to $71,341.12. In the fiscal year ended June 30, 1905, the postage on the mails carried by these same steamers amounted to $93,065.84. Better facilities for communication naturally and inevitably increase the volume of communication, and the actual net cost of the new mail lines that would be established under this bill would be constantly decreasing with the increase in trade with South America, Australasia, and the Orient. Besides the increased receipts from postage, due to an increased commerce, the United States, under this bill, would receive the further advantage of having constantly at hand a fleet of auxiliary cruisers, American built and American manned, ready to reenforce our fighting navy and to transport our troops in time of war. The ocean-mail law of 1891 requires that all the ships of the first three classes carrying the mails under these contracts shall be designed and constructed with especial reference to this auxiliary service. The foreign ships now carrying our mails would be available in war for use not for us, but against us.

PROVISIONS OF THE LAW OF 1891.

The ocean-mail law of 1891, of which this proposed bill is an amendment, applies to the new ocean-mail routes which may be established under this bill if enacted. This law of 1891 requires—

1. That the contracts under it shall be awarded only to American citizens for steamships of American registry, for a term of not less than five nor more than ten years, these contracts being given, after due public advertisement, to the lowest responsible bidder, and the mail service "to be equitably distributed among the Atlantic, Mexican Gulf, and Pacific ports."

2. The steamships shall be American-built, owned and officered by American citizens and manned during the first two years of a contract by crews at least one-fourth of whom are Americans, during the next three years one-third Americans, and thereafter at least one-half Americans.

3. The steamships of the first, second, and third classes—that is, of at least 20, 16, and 14 knots, respectively—employed under these contracts "shall be constructed with particular reference to prompt and economical conversion into auxiliary naval cruisers, and according to plans and specifications to be agreed on by and between the owners and the Secretary of the Navy, and they shall be of sufficient strength and stability to carry and sustain the working and operation of at least four effective rifled cannon of a caliber of not less than six inches, and shall be of the highest rating known to maritime commerce." The latest ships built under this law of 1891, four 18-knot Ward liners for service to Cuba and Mexico, are especially constructed to carry batteries each of eleven powerful rapid-fire guns.

4. The compensation for mail service shall not exceed $4 a mile outward for ships of the first class of at least 20 knots speed and 8,000 tons gross register; $2 a mile for ships of the second class of at least 16 knots speed and 5,000 tons gross register; $1 a mile for third-class ships of at least 14 knots speed and 2,500 tons gross register; and 66⅔ cents a mile for ships of the fourth class of at least 12 knots speed and 1,500 tons gross register. The present bill increases the compensation only of second-class ships on routes more than 4,000 miles in length to South America, Japan, China, the Philippines, and Australasia.

5. Payment is deducted for voyages omitted and penalties imposed for delays or irregularities, and no steamship performing a contract shall receive any other subsidy or bounty from the United States.

6. These contract steamships must take as cadets or apprentices one American-born boy for each 1,000 tons gross register and one for each majority fraction thereof—these boys to be educated in seamanship and rank as petty officers.

7. These contract steamers may be taken and used by the United States as transports or cruisers upon payment to the owners of the fair, actual value of the ships, any disagreement as to price to be settled by arbitration. Ships were actually taken without trouble under this provision in the Spanish war.

WHAT THE UNITED STATES GAINS.

All of these requirements of the law of 1891 represent substantial advantages which the United States gains when it makes contracts with American ships, instead of giving mail pay on a basis of weight to noncontract American and to foreign vessels. Contract mail liners perform a distinct service for the Government beyond anything given by ordinary commercial ships when they employ crews a certain increasing proportion of whom are American citizens. Another distinct service is gained when these contract ships are designed and built in a way to fit them for auxiliary naval use in war. The officering and manning of the merchant marine and the auxiliary navy are provided for in the requirement, made of these contract mail ships alone, that they shall carry American boys to be instructed in seamanship. And these contract mail steamships only are under obligation to be taken by the Government at a price to be fixed by arbitration, in war.

These are considerations, besides the very great improvement in the postal service, that deserve to be taken into account in estimating the increased cost of such a service. The United States pays more, but it receives more. Moreover, it should be remembered that the estimates of the cost of the new lines to be established under this bill are statements of the maximum expenditure that can not possibly be exceeded on any given route. As the Committee on Commerce stated, in ordering a favorable report upon this bill:

> The actual bids of steamship companies might be for smaller amounts, and would be sure to be for smaller amounts, if there were several bidders. Moreover, the Postmaster-General, in his discretion, might decline to pay more than $3 per mile if he believed that this rate was sufficient compensation to secure a service; thus, the present contract mail line to Cuba and Mexico is paid only $1 a mile, though it operates 17 and 18 knot steamers of the second class, which would be entitled to $2 under the law as it now exists. This is a short route, and the American postal line has become firmly established and prosperous.

As an illustration of that, Mr. President, the Ward Line from New York to Mexico and Cuba, which is entitled to $2 a mile under the law of 1891, actually receives only $1 a mile, it being willing to perform the service for that amount.

So, also, on the contract line to Jamaica, though the Postmaster-General is authorized by law to pay $1 a mile for 14-knot steamers, he actually secures the services of 15-knot steamers for 66⅔ cents a mile. These short routes to the West Indies are easier and less expensive to operate. American shipping has retained a firmer hold there. Coal is much cheaper than it is in distant foreign ports, and the ships required for the postal service do not need to be so large, capacious, and powerful. The experience of seventeen years has abundantly proved that the maximum present rate of $2 a mile outward for 16-knot ships will not procure the establishment of American postal service to South America, Australasia, and the Orient.

WHAT OTHER NATIONS PAY.

The total cost of the existing contract ocean mail lines of the United States in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1906, was $1,481,915.86. Since then the Oceanic Line to Australasia, whose mail pay was about $283,000 a year, has been suspended. This leaves the present actual expenditure of the United States on its contract and ocean mail lines about $1,200,000 a year. This is actually less than the sum ($1,330,000) the German Government gives in mail pay to a single steamship company, the North German Lloyd, for a service in 15-knot ships to Japan, China, and Australasia. It is less than the $1,650,000 which the British Government pays to a single British company, the Peninsular and Oriental, covering much the same routes. Yet it will not seriously be denied that the United States has even more at stake than Germany or Great Britain in the commerce of the great countries bordering the Pacific Ocean.

Altogether, the present British and colonial expenditure for postal and admiralty purposes, exclusively to British steamers, is now close to $6,000,000 a year. In the last sixty years Great Britain has expended from $250,000,000 to $300,000,000 in payments to her great ocean mail lines, now numbering about thirty and encircling the entire world.

France is paying about $5,000,000 a year on her ocean mail lines to her colonial and foreign markets. Japan is now expending about $4,000,000 a year for these same purposes.

If all the new ocean mail lines suggested in the report of the Committee on Commerce were established by the United States, the maximum expenditure on these services would be $3,630,370 a year, which, added to our present expenditure of about $1,200,000, would be about $4,800,000 a year, or less than either Great Britain or France is now devoting to her ocean postal service, and but little more than is now paid by Japan. It would be but about 5 per cent of the present annual expenditure upon our fighting navy, and less than one-sixth of 1 per cent of the annual value of the foreign commerce of the United States. And it must be kept in mind that the amount will be considerably reduced by the withdrawal of pay from foreign steamships and the increased postal revenue that will necessarily result from the establishment of American steamship lines to the countries with which we desire to increase our trade.

NUMBER OF SHIPS REQUIRED.

To equip fully the postal lines that would most probably be established under the terms of this bill to South America and across the Pacific Ocean, would require from twenty-five to thirty 16-knot steamships of the auxiliary-cruiser class, as follows:

	Number of ships.
Atlantic or Gulf coast to Rio de Janeiro (5,000 nautical miles)	5
Atlantic or Gulf coast to Buenos Ayres (6,000 nautical miles)	6
Pacific coast via Hawaii to Japan, China, and the Philippines (7,800 nautical miles)	6
Pacific coast direct to Japan, China, and the Philippines (6,500 nautical miles)	6
Pacific coast via Hawaii to Australasia (7,300 nautical miles)	4
Total	27

This estimate is on the basis of fortnightly sailings on the first four lines, or twenty-six outward voyages a year, and of sailings once in three weeks, or eighteen voyages a year, on the line to Australasia. It is possible that the line via Hawaii to the Orient would require seven ships instead of six, unless a speed of more than 16 knots was attained or very quick dispatch given at all ports of call.

In the Atlantic Ocean not one steamship of the requisite power and speed is now available, so far as is known, to operate a 16-knot mail service to South America. There are some 16-knot steamers, of 5,000 tons and upward, owned at Atlantic ports, but they are regularly engaged in the passenger and freight trade of the coastwise lines or are under contract to carry the mails to Cuba and Mexico, or are owned by the United States Government. It is practically certain that every one of the eleven steamships required for Atlantic-Gulf lines to South America would have to be designed and built before the lines could be established.

On the Pacific there are now five steamships of the Pacific Mail, of 16 knots speed, in service. One of these is small and old and likely soon to be discarded. There are also three 16-knot steamships of the former Oceanic Line to Australasia, laid up in San Francisco Bay. It is stated, however, that if this bill were passed, and the Oceanic Company resumed the Australasian route, it would sell these three steamships just as soon as larger and more powerful ships could be constructed. The three American steamers now running from Puget Sound to the Orient—one owned by the Great Northern Steamship Company and two by the Boston Steamship Company—are classified as 14-knot ships, and are apparently ineligible under the proposed bill.

More than twenty new and powerful steamships, built on designs approved by the Navy Department for auxiliary use in war, would, therefore, be added to the fleet of the United States by the legislation now proposed in the five routes indicated. The British port of Hongkong is now the terminus of most of the noncontract American steamers crossing the Pacific Ocean. The Post-Office Department would undoubtedly require contract ships to prolong their voyage to the American port of Manila.

THE SOUTH AMERICAN STEAMSHIP TRUST.

And now I beg to call the attention of the Senate to another phase of this subject. The trust question has been uppermost in the minds of the American people during the past few years. An American trust can be dealt with through the instrumentality of American laws, but a foreign trust is beyond our reach. That the commerce of South America is dominated by a foreign steamship trust is well known—a trust that can give rebates at pleasure, and that can and does lower and increase prices according to circumstances. I recall the fact, Mr. President, that last year when this subject was under debate the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] called attention in a very emphatic way to this foreign steamship trust. This trust is so powerful that not one American steamship and only fourteen American sail vessels took cargoes from our whole Atlantic coast for Brazil and Argentina in the first six months of 1906, and matters have not improved since. So far as steamships are concerned this important American trade is now, and for several years has been, monopolized by a foreign shipping trust or combination, whose weapons are rebates, discriminations, and boycotting, and whose policies are dictated from Liverpool and Hamburg.

The following special cable appeared in the New York Herald of the 16th instant, only a few days ago:

HAMBURG, Saturday.—The conference held during the last three days in London by representatives of all the German and English steamship companies engaged in the trade between North America and Brazil, during which Herr Ballin, director general of the Hamburg-American company, acted as chairman, is reported to have resulted in an agreement by which the rate war, which has now lasted more than one year, is terminated. It is added that a community of interests in which all the companies participate has been created.

Some months ago Brazilian merchants, exasperated by the greed and inefficiency of the European steamship trust, whose meeting is described above, started a steamship line of their own in rather small, slow steamers, running once a month from Rio de Janeiro to New York. The European ship trust, that has long monopolized our carrying trade with South America, instantly declared a rate war on this Brazilian line, and sought to destroy it. It is this rate war, which temporarily on the days just before the sailing of the Brazilian steamers has brought freight rates down to a low figure, that is now ended at the meeting of the trust described above. It is, therefore, apparent that the trust rates of freight between the United States and Brazil will go back to their former high figure, a figure repeatedly complained of by American consuls and merchants as extortionate.

This meeting of the European steamship trust, just when this ocean-mail bill was coming up in Congress, brings out vividly the fact that English and German merchants, controlling entirely the steamship communication between this country and South America, are able to sit down in conference and dictate the terms at which the flour and provisions of Wisconsin, Minnesota and Nebraska and the agricultural machinery of Illinois are to be sold in the chief markets of South America.

Herr Ballin, described in the New York Herald dispatch as presiding at this meeting of the European ship trust, is the head of the great Hamburg-American Steamship Company of Germany, the greatest ship corporation in the world, which is said to be unsubsidized, but which has the powerful backing of the Imperial Government. Through Herr Ballin the Imperial Government at Berlin is able to say how much the manufacturers and farmers of America shall pay in freight rates to foreign steamships, in order to sell in the markets of Brazil and Argentina American products, competing with the products of Germany. It was this same Herr Ballin who, in our war with Spain, took several fast steamships out of his New York service—ships built for the American service and supported by the patronage of the American people—and sold them to the Spanish Government, to "burn, sink, and destroy" the commerce of the United States. One or two of these ships formed a part of the fleet which Spain fitted out at Cadiz, under Admiral Camara, to attack the squadron of Admiral Dewey, after the victory of Manila Bay.

It is the same Herr Ballin, head of this great shipping trust, who, whenever any measure for the upbuilding of an independent American shipping to compete with his trust appears before Congress, always issues a manifesto against it, sometimes coming to this country to distribute his arguments more widely among the American press. At the same time he takes advantage of the fact that there are almost no American ocean ships, and none at all in our trade with the great countries of South America, to operate a trust or combination of foreign shipowners.

The Hamburg-American Company, of which Herr Ballin is the head, is at this very time being accused before the Interstate Commerce Commission of maintaining a trust or combination "in restraint of trade" in our commerce with the northern ports of Europe. To this complaint of American merchants, Herr Ballin, through distinguished counsel, has made reply that the Interstate Commerce Commission has no jurisdiction over his company, or, in other words, that the United States Government is unable to protect its citizens and its trade against the oppressive acts of these European steamship trusts and combinations. It is directly at this South American trust or combination that this present bill is aimed. If it passes it will break this foreign ship monopoly by creating a line of American steamships, far superior in speed, regularity, and efficiency to the ships of the foreign trust, between the United States and South America. And these American ships, built, owned, and run by American citizens in American interests, and with their officers domiciled in this country, will be responsible to American law, and will have everything to gain by "fair play" with the American people and working to increase American commerce.

The issue is clear-cut between this European steamship trust on the one hand and the provisions of this bill for the upbuilding of an independent American steamship service to the great ports of the southern hemisphere on the other hand, and it is for Congress to decide the issue.

Consul-General Seeger, at Rio de Janeiro, spoke thus of this foreign steamship combination in a report in 1903, and the same conditions remain unchanged:

The united steamship companies which control the carrying trade between the United States and Brazil—the Lamport & Holt Line, the Prince Line, the Robert M. Sloman Line, and the Chargeurs Reunis—have agreed to raise their rates on coffee from Santos and Rio de Janeiro from 30 cents and 5 per cent primage per bag of 133 pounds to 35 cents and 5 per cent.

In an earlier report Consul-General Seeger had stated:

Since last August the freights have been raised and lowered and lowered and raised again to suit the purpose of the trust till they have reached their present level. * * * The trust has an agreement with coffee shippers here to pay them a rebate of 5 per cent at the end of every six months from the date of the agreement on all freights collected: Provided, however, That this rebate is forfeited in case the shippers give freight to any vessel not belonging to the trust during the period stipulated. Through this arrangement the trust controls the shippers, and American vessels go home in ballast.

A writer and traveler, Julian Haugwitz, in American Trade, has thus described the situation:

Our commerce with Brazil and the River Plata countries is at the mercy of such a shipping combine. Ostensibly four lines are competing in "serving" the route between New York and Pernambuco southward, viz, the Lamport & Holt Line, Prince Line, Norton Line, all British, and the R. M. Sloman Line, which is German. In reality, however, the management of these services is centralized in Liverpool, the freights are pooled, and the spoils divided.

At the head of this syndicate stands Lamport & Holt, of Liverpool, a powerful firm, owning and managing over a hundred vessels. The ships engaged in the New York-South American service are mostly slow and obsolete, steaming 8 to 10 knots an hour, and yet the rates of freight levied on American cargo are nearly double those charged by the speedy, modern, elegant ships plying between Europe and the east coast of South America. Not a case of kerosene or a bag of coffee can escape paying toll to this freight ring, and there was more truth than comedy in the facetious request sent by a Rio shipper to the syndicate's agents at that port asking for a permit to ship some coffee on an outside vessel over their ocean. Numerous tramps or outsiders have been willing in Brazilian ports to take coffee to New York for 20 cents a bag instead of 40 cents, as now exacted. But whenever such a vessel has been placed on the berth the syndicate has promptly lowered its freight to 10 cents, besides boycotting the shippers patronizing the intruder.

A POLICY OF EXCLUSION.

Another way by which the syndicate tightens its grip on its victims is to offer them a graduated return on the freights paid at the end of the year, provided no case of infidelity has occurred. An example illustrative of the combine's methods of persuasion and the shippers' liberty of trade happened last fall, when a large coffee firm in Santos received an order for 20,000 bags of coffee from New York. The syndicate's freight charge was 40 cents a bag plus 5 per cent, but several outsiders were anxious to carry this cargo at 20 cents, which meant a saving of $4,000 to the exporter on this lot alone, and in the same proportion an economy of $1,000,000 to American coffee drinkers on the 5,000,000 bags imported from Brazil last crop year. The firm in question, having the freight room on hand at 20 cents, asked the syndicate to take the coffee at the same rate, and on the latter's refusal advanced its offer to 30 cents. The combine insisted on its full pound of flesh, and when the exporter accepted the tramp's charter the former dropped its rates to 15 cents and later to 10 cents for all other shippers, debarring this firm and one or two other strikers from shipping on the combined boats except at the full old rates.

The enormous advantages enjoyed by their less independent competitors, thanks to the combine's bounty, and worth thousands of dollars a day in a business worked on close margins and daily cable offers, soon brought the insurgents to terms, capitulation followed and the former rates were restored. One overconscientious agent at Santos demurred to boycotting his neighbor, and his scruples cost him the loss of the Sloman Line agency.

A New York merchant, familiar with the Brazilian trade, wrote thus on August 19, 1905, in the New York Journal of Commerce:

I beg leave to call your attention to the very important fact, evidently overlooked by Special Agent Hutchinson and Consul Furniss, that merchants dealing with Brazil have valid and just causes for complaint, owing to the fact that all the steam transportation companies carrying freight between United States ports and Brazil formed a combination some years ago, and as they monopolized the trade their rates of freight are so high as to be prejudicial to the business interests of those who are unfortunately obliged to patronize these companies.

Any independent merchant in this city (New York) or in Brazil—whether importer or exporter—knows that the Lamport & Holt, Prince, and Sloman lines, plying between this and Brazilian ports, from Pernambuco southward, exact exorbitantly high rates of freight on merchandise carried either way. In the coffee trade it is a well-known fact that these monopolists, notably Lamport & Holt, discriminate in favor of some of the large importers of coffee by making them substantial concessions in freight, which, of course, is detrimental to the smaller importers. This disgraceful state of affairs certainly calls for a drastic remedy. As a merchant and shipper long connected with Brazil, I most heartily and unqualifiedly indorse Consul Furniss's recommendation concerning the need for an American steamship line between the United States and Brazil. Practically the entire trade between the United States and Amazon ports and Maranham and Ceara is monopolized by the Booth Steamship Company of Liverpool, which, owing to arrangements concluded with other steamship companies, dictates rates, conditions, etc., to suit itself, but always at the expense of the interests of this country. I hope the consul's appeal will result in the establishment of a new line of steamers, which I am positive would speedily secure a very large share of the business between this country and Brazil.

Consul Furniss, at Bahia, alluded to above, said in his annual report for 1904:

I have to reiterate my oft-repeated report of the need for an American steamship line. The mail service between the United States and this section of Brazil during the year just past has become much worse than heretofore, due to the withdrawal of one or two monthly boats. As a result of the cargo offering here for the United States and the frequent call of vessels to get it, coupled with the fact that Brazil requires all steamers to take mail, there have been frequent calls of vessels to get mails from here, but there is only one regular boat bringing mails from New York. Between times letters are sent hither from New York by various roundabout ways. This has virtually paralyzed the mail service. For this reason it is frequently the case that mail sent from New York in the middle of a month arrives here days after the mail leaving New York on the first of the ensuing month. This causes great prejudice to business, as the mails arriving last often have bills of lading and custom-house documents for goods arriving by the prior steamer, necessitating extra expense, vexatious delays, and great trouble to withdraw from the custom-house here, which seriously hurts our trade.

It is impossible to maintain trade without frequent and rapid mail service. With the lack of this to contend with and the high freight charges out of New York, it is not to be wondered at that year by year our trade with this section is growing less, while the balance of trade in favor of Brazil is increasing. The present lines from New York seem to prefer high freight and little business, and make up by sending their vessels on a triangular course, viz, from Brazil to the United States, from the United States to Europe, and then from Europe, with European goods, to Brazil, with only a few vessels going and coming between Brazil and the United States direct. The German steamship lines are making preparations for an increased service with Brazil. With the aid given by these lines German trade has increased even more rapidly than ours is decreasing, and with the contemplated further increase in its fleet the outlook for German trade is even brighter than heretofore.

The manner in which the trade interests of the United States are made to suffer by reason of the inadequacy of the transportation service between this country and South American ports is nothing short of a crime which must be laid at the doors of Congress. Religiously protecting our interests in every other way, fostering and encouraging our manufacturers and developing home industries for domestic consumption, it makes no provisions for markets for surplus products, and thus paves the way for future industrial stagnation. In the meantime other countries reap the benefits of the trade demands of these nations by establishing steamship lines and commercial agencies in every important city. Is it any wonder that Mr. Lincoln Hutchinson, who is now in Brazil making a study of the conditions there, exclaims: "The mass of the people scarcely know that such a country as the United States exists!"

In 1904 Hon. John Barrett, then minister to Argentina, said in an address on our South American trade before the Merchant Marine Commission:

I wish to explain a little in regard to this point. The question arises, If the business is there why do not men go into it? Let me remind you that Europe has become established in this trade in the first place, and that she controls it at the present time. All the steamship lines that undertake this business are European steamship lines, and wishing to build up the trade with Europe rather than with America they form combinations and use their influence against the establishment of American lines. You see that in the agreement of the Lamport & Holt Line, which runs a line of passenger to Rio, but does not go on to Buenos Ayres. Because of an agreement with the Royal Mail Steamship Company of England they agree that they will not run their passenger steamers farther than Rio, and yet I was informed in New York and Philadelphia that an American company was already organized that would be willing to undertake to put on a line of steamers between New York and Buenos Ayres, provided they could receive enough money for carrying the mails to insure them against loss while they were establishing a regular trade and traffic.

Mr. Anderson, the present consul-general at Rio de Janeiro, speaks of the foreign steamship combination in the Daily Consular and Trade Reports of September 29, 1906:

Merchants complain that the high freight rates obtaining on goods from the United States to Brazil generally continue to act as a deterrent to trade in general. The conference rates (the conference is the European steamship trust) on goods from the United States to this part of South America are nearly twice as high as freight rates from Asiatic ports to the United States.

Ambassador Griscom, at Rio de Janeiro, in a report to the State Department, published in the Daily Consular and Trade Reports of October 1, 1906, says:

The English company of Lamport & Holt have been running a monthly service (between Rio and New York) with a practical monopoly, and without competition the freights have been prohibitive. It is hoped that we are entering upon a new era, more favorable to merchants who may desire to reach out for trade with Brazil. The crying need of our relations with Brazil is better steamship communication. Inquiry among our leading financiers and merchants indicates that encouragement by our National Government in the form of a small postal or other subvention would quickly bring about the establishment of a good line of American steamers between New York and Rio. Given a few facilities our trade with Brazil must inevitably go ahead with leaps and bounds.

Consul-General Anderson has this to say on the subject:

Freights between the United States and Brazil are much higher than those obtaining in the rest of the world, the rate from New York to Rio de Janeiro being about twice what the rate is from Hongkong to New York. American exporters are vitally interested in this matter, for even assuming that the rates from Europe to Brazil and from the United States to Brazil are practically the same—a fact which is not yet established—it is yet to be noted that the high freight rates shut American exporters out of markets which otherwise they might have. Low freight rates, for instance, would enable American millers to ship American flour to ports in Brazil far south of their present limit. Freight rates from New York to Brazil similar to those obtaining between New York and the Far East would mean largely increased sales of American flour. What is true of flour is true of other things. The rebate system adopted by the shipping combine also works directly and materially against small shippers, among the latter being most American exporters selling to the Brazilian trade.

One or more strong American steamship lines, sufficiently compensated by the Government for the carriage of our mails, will effectually thwart the schemes of this now all-powerful foreign steamship trust, and secure competition in the trade with South America.

EARLY OCEAN MAIL LEGISLATION.

Mr. President, national aid to ocean mail lines is not a new policy in America. It was first adopted in 1845, more than sixty years ago, and it is a significant fact that the public men who took the initiative in that legislation were vigorous, able, and patriotic southern men. President Polk urged the policy, and under the legislation then enacted three steamship lines were established to Europe—one to Great Britain, one to France, and one to Germany. Lines were also established from New York and southern ports to the West Indies and the Isthmus of Panama, and also in the Pacific from the Isthmus northward to California and Oregon. About $2,000,000 a year in mail subsidies was paid to these lines when they were established. Their competition reduced freight rates enormously. The question was not a partisan one, southern men in Congress, as before suggested, being the most earnest supporters of the legislation. Unfortunately the matter was drawn into the sectional controversy of the period preceding the civil war. In 1856 the system was broken down, and in 1858 the repeal of the laws was entirely effective. Commodore Vanderbilt then tried to run trans-Atlantic steamers without postal subsidies, but even his genius was not sufficient to enable him to compete with the annual subsidy of nearly $900,000 paid by Great Britain to the Cunard Line. Thus the American flag practically disappeared from the steam routes of the South Atlantic before the breaking out of the civil war.

I beg to append the utterances of leading statesmen, most of them from the South, in advocacy of the legislation of 1845, similar to that which is now proposed.

President Tyler, in a message to Congress, in December, 1844, said:

I can not too strongly urge the policy of authorizing the establishment of a line of steamships regularly to ply between this country and foreign ports, and upon our own waters, for the transportation of the mail. The example of the British Government is well worthy of imitation in this respect. The belief is strongly entertained that the emoluments arising from the transportation of mail matter to foreign countries would operate of itself as an inducement to cause individual enterprise to undertake that branch of the task, and the remuneration to the Government would consist in the addition readily made to our steam Navy in case of emergency by the ships so employed. Should this suggestion meet your approval, the propriety of placing such ships under the command of experienced officers of the Navy will not escape your observation. The application of steam to the purpose of naval warfare cogently recommends an extensive steam marine as important in estimating the defenses of the country. Fortunately this may be attained by us to a great extent without incurring any large amount of expenditure. Steam vessels, to be engaged in the transportation of the mails on our principal water courses, lakes, and parts of our coast, can also be so constructed as to be efficient as war vessels when needed, and would of themselves constitute a formidable force in order to repel attacks from abroad.

We can not be blind to the fact that other nations have already added large numbers of steamships to their naval armaments and that this new and powerful agent is destined to revolutionize the condition of the world. It becomes the United States, therefore, looking to their security, to adopt a similar policy, and the plan suggested will enable them to do so at a small comparative cost.

President Polk said in a message to Congress:

The enlightened policy by which a rapid communication with the various distant parts of the world is established by means of American-built steamers would find an ample reward in the increase of our commerce and in making our country and its resources more favorably known abroad; but the national advantage is still greater of having our naval officers made familiar with steam navigation, and of having the privilege of taking the ships already equipped for immediate service at a moment's notice, and will be cheaply purchased by the compensation to be paid for the transportation of mails over and above the postage received. A just national pride, no less than our commercial interests, would seem to favor the policy of augmenting the number of this description of vessels.

Hon. Thomas Butler King, of Georgia, in 1848, presented a full statement of the British policy of mail subsidies from 1839 to 1848, and showed how the American plan of keeping ships of war on the stocks at naval stations in readiness for service had proved a failure. He then went on to say:

The plan for increasing the Navy which I propose to substitute for the one which we have so long and so unprofitably pursued is, first, to encourage the establishment by private enterprise, under the auspices of the Government, of as many lines of steam mail packets as our commercial intercourse will warrant and sustain. I have no doubt that we may employ in this way from 25 to 30 steamers of the largest class, which will be kept in repair by the contractors and be at all times liable to be taken into the service of the Government at a fair valuation. It will be to the interest of the contractors to adopt, from time to time, all the improvements which may be made in machinery and the means of propulsion. We shall avoid the expense of mistakes in construction and machinery. These vessels will contribute largely to the extension and increase of our commerce, and will be infinitely more efficient in protecting our coast in the event of war than all the fortifications we have constructed or may construct at twenty times their cost. * * *

In the discussions which have been occasioned by the appropriation asked to meet the contracts for this mail service, it has been argued that it is quite unnecessary for the Government to contribute in any degree to sustain it; that private enterprise, if left untrammeled "by Government schemes and legal enactments," would sustain itself against all foreign competition. To show the fallacy of this reasoning it is only necessary to state a few facts connected with the recent voyage of the steamer United States to Liverpool. The price of freight from Liverpool to New York, as established by the Cunard Line, is £7 per ton, and the price of passage £30 per head. While the United States was in dock at Liverpool the agents of the Cunard Line, to prevent freight and passengers going on her, reduced the price of freight by the Hibernia to £4 per ton and to £2 10s. by the Niagara, and they offered to take passengers as low as £12 each. It was announced at the same time, in Harden's Liverpool Circular, that the old rates would be resumed immediately after the departure of the American ship. The British line, sustained by the Government, was enabled to adopt this course with impunity in competition with a ship sustained by individual enterprise alone.

And it must, I suppose, be admitted that our own citizens, if not aided in undertakings of this sort by their own Government, would be quite incapable of competing for any considerable time with so powerful an opposition. This being the case, it must be apparent to anyone who will investigate the subject that in a very short time the most valuable portion of our carrying trade would pass into the bottoms of these British mail packets. The steamer United States is strictly a private enterprise. She has proved herself the fastest ocean steamer in the world, and has a greater capacity for the accommodation of passengers and for carrying freight than any commercial steamer hitherto constructed; yet, unaided by the Government, and having such powerful rivals to contend against, she must prove a ruinous undertaking to the owners. It was in view of this state of facts that I offered my second resolution.

In 1849 Mr. King further said:

Great Britain is thus enabled, by combining commercial enterprise with her naval armament, to keep afloat a steam force more than equal to one-half of our ships in commission and to maintain twenty of these powerful steamers in constant and active service at a cost of $1,000,000 annually. By the Cunard and "West India" lines of mail steamers Great Britain maintains rapid and certain communication with her colonies on this side of the Atlantic, the United States, Mexico, and her fleets in the Pacific Ocean.

In the event of war she could readily command this force and concentrate it at any point upon our Atlantic or Gulf coast, and our vast commerce, valued at some $200,000,000, would, without suitable preparation on our part, fall a prey to her arms. It is mortifying to reflect that this force, which may become so formidable against us, is in a great degree supported by the intercourse growing out of our own commercial enterprise. While our commercial marine is unrivaled and our sails whiten every ocean and our steam marine at home is superior to that of all other nations, we have been left in the distance and outmaneuvered by our great commercial rival in the employment of steam upon the ocean.

If it be asked why Great Britain has thus taken the lead of us in ocean steam navigation while we are so greatly superior in domestic steamers and sailing ships, the answer is that she has anticipated us through the extension of her mail system to foreign countries in combination with her naval arrangements, thus rendering it almost impossible for mere private enterprise to enter into competition with her.

France also has become alive to the importance of this great system, and her minister of finance has been authorized to treat with companies for the establishment of lines of steamers to Brazil, Habana, New York, La Plata, La Guaira, and such ports in the Gulf of Mexico and the Antilles as may be designated by royal ordinance.

Mr. King had been advocating the expenditure of a million dollars a year for ocean mail service—two lines, one from a northern and one from a southern port to Europe, and two lines to the West Indies and the Isthmus of Panama—the steamers carrying the mails to be built on designs approved by the Navy Department, and held at the disposal of the Government in war.

Hon. Lewis Cass, of Michigan, in the United States Senate, May 7, 1852:

If the line we have established between this country and England should be now abandoned, I take it for granted that the business would be done by the British line. In that event the postal treaty would probably be terminated by notice, which each government has the right to give, and the postage would be raised at least as high as it was before the reduction occasioned by the results of competition. The same freights of valuable goods would be carried as now, but at enhanced rates of transportation. Therefore in a financial point of view it seems to me that there are many considerations that weigh against the abandonment of this line.

Hon. George E. Badger, of North Carolina, in the United States Senate, May 6, 1852, in the debate on the Collins and Cunard steamship services:

Mr. President, the question submitted for the consideration of the Senate is, we all admit, a question of high and controlling importance. It has been said in the course of this discussion that the contest between these two lines is now becoming a national contest between this country and Great Britain. I desire to amend that statement. From the very moment of the institution of the Collins Line it was a national contest. It has not recently assumed that character. It has always borne it. The enterprise was very far indeed from being in fact, or from being regarded by the country, as a mere contest between two rival companies of shipowners. It was one great active contest in that mighty drama for the mastery of the seas—for superiority in everything that belongs to strength, speed, effective power, and success for war and for commercial purposes, which long has been, and ever must be, the mightiest contest between this country and Great Britain. After having entered upon this peaceful and at the same time most important contest, the question presented to the American Congress now is, whether we shall dishonorably retrace our steps, whether, when the hand is stretched out to seize the crown of victory, we shall voluntarily forget our advantages, retire from the high and eminent position we now occupy in the eyes of all the civilized world, and voluntarily surrender that which to obtain and perpetuate Great Britain would without any hesitation sacrifice a hundred times the amount of money which is involved in the question now before the Senate.

Hon. Thomas J. Rusk, of Texas, in the United States Senate, March 3, 1853:

I know that this granting of an increased compensation to these vessels has been a fruitful theme for stump speeches all over the United States, but the system has made an advertisement throughout every sea, that the Americans are the best shipbuilders in the world, and have distanced their rivals. More than that, it has given you twenty-eight or thirty steamships, fit for war purposes, without additional expense to your Navy, for one-tenth of the sum for which you could build and maintain them in your Navy proper. We owe it to American industry and enterprise, to the hardy citizens of our country, to maintain the system. And we owe it to our national defenses, in my opinion, to maintain it.

Hon. James Shields, of Illinois, United States Senate, May 6, 1852:

While the competition was between the American people and the English people the American people were successful; but when the English Government and the English people, united with the immense capital of their country, have devoted the whole energies of that nation to the building up and monopolizing of the steam power of the world it is idle to talk about American citizens entering into competition with them. It is out of the question. You will have to bring home your lines and confine yourselves to your own inland trade and to your interior commerce. But never again, in my humble opinion, if you abandon this line, can you enter into competition with Great Britain on the ocean, so far as steam navigation is concerned. Her government and her people and her capital all unite in sustaining her lines.

Hon. Volney B. Howard, of Texas, House of Representatives, July 6, 1852:

The support of the Collins Line, therefore, is not a mere local question. It is of direct interest to every man who grows a bale of cotton or consumes a pound of foreign goods or produce. The subject of cheap freights is also one of vital importance to the great Southwest and Northwest. It is to determine whether corn, flour, and other provisions can be exported to Europe to any great extent for a series of years when the crops are not short on the other side of the Atlantic. It involves the question of cheap bread to the toiling and starving millions of the Old World in exchange for clothing for the men of the New. It is a question of no ordinary moment to both, and especially to the exporters and producers of provisions in the Western States. Let their Representatives look to it. As soon as the Collins Line is withdrawn the Cunarders will raise freights to the price they bore previous to the competition created by the American steamers.

Not only is the South especially interested in this subject as a question of freight, but in the continuance of the system, as it affects her own commerce and navigation. There is no doubt that the great eastern cities, if the British Government did not interpose to support English competition, might establish and maintain a line of steamers to Liverpool. But the southern cities have not at present sufficient commerce to enable them to sustain any line of steamers to a foreign port without the mail pay of the Government. Two or three southern lines have been projected, all of great importance to the country if they can be sustained. I allude especially to the one from New Orleans to Vera Cruz, and from some southern port to the mouth of the Amazon.

Hon. James A. Bayard, of Delaware, used the following significant language in a speech in the United States Senate, May 10, 1852:

Mr. President, free trade, even by those who advocate it to the utmost extent, must be founded upon the doctrine of reciprocity. Reciprocity is the doctrine of our Government. It is true that foreign governments may force you, by their action, into a course of policy, which, if they abstained from action, would be unwise on our part. I am willing to trust American skill and American industry in competition with any people on the globe, when they stand nation opposed to nation, without governmental interference. But if the treasury of a foreign nation is pouring into the laps of individuals for the purpose of destroying either the iron interest of my country or for the purpose of building up the commercial marine at the expense of the commerce and prosperity of the United States, I for one will count no cost in countervailing such governmental action on the part of Great Britain or any other foreign power. * * *

The necessary result, if you refuse this appropriation, will be the abandonment of the line. Its abandonment yields to Great Britain the entire postal service between England and America certainly, and between a great part of the continent of Europe and America; for if this line goes down your other lines of ocean steamers must follow it. Its abandonment yields to her the entire transportation of passengers, except emigrants. It yields to her a tax upon American industry and upon American property in the shape of freight upon light and costly goods. With success just achieved I am not willing to surrender this prize to the English Government, to which they attach so much importance, and which, if not unprotected in the contest, we are just on the eve of dividing with them. I bear no hostility toward England particularly, but whenever I find that the honor, the reputation, the pride, and character of my country is concerned, or her interests, I would assert them without regard to cost, and the more certainly against a haughty and overbearing power like England than against a feebler state. Sir, withdraw this appropriation, let this line be abandoned, and can you tell me that it will not pass into the hands of a foreign government—that it will not pass into the hands of your commercial rivals?

What would be the feelings of Senators who now oppose this appropriation if, at a future day, in the contingency of war, these derided vessels should make their appearance on your coast with the British flag flying at their foremast and aid in the devastation of your country and the destruction of your commerce? Such a thing is entirely within the range, not of imagination, but I may say within the range of probability. If you determine that you will abandon this line, you compel the sale of these magnificent steamers, which have been built at so much cost, in pursuance of the policy indicated in your act of 1847, and you know not to whom that sale will be made. It is from these feelings, and because the deliberate result of my own judgment on this appropriation is that it is a national matter, in which the national interests, national honor, national pride, and national reputation are deeply concerned, I am unwilling, for the sake of $300,000 or $500,000, or for any cost even, though it reach millions, to sacrifice them and give the ascendency in this contest to Great Britain. Admitting the amount to be requisite and the principle of relief in accordance with a wise policy, I shall vote for the amendment as reported by the committee.

Mr. President, I can not refrain from emphasizing what Mr. Bayard said in 1852, as quoted above, on the subject that is engaging our attention to-day. Listen to the testimony of an old-time Democrat:

Free trade, said Mr. Bayard, even by those who advocate it to the utmost extent, must be founded upon the doctrine of reciprocity. Reciprocity is the doctrine of our Government. It is true that foreign governments may force you, by their action, into a course of policy which, if they abstained from action, would be unwise on our part. I am willing to trust American skill and American industry in competition with any people on the globe, when they stand nation opposed to nation, without governmental interference. But if the treasury of a foreign nation is pouring into the laps of individuals for the purpose of destroying either the iron interest of my country or for the purpose of building up the commercial marine at the expense of the commerce and prosperity of the United States, I for one will count no cost in countervailing such governmental action on the part of Great Britain or any other foreign power.

That was good doctrine for the year 1852. It is equally good doctrine for the year 1908. Apply it and the bill now being considered will pass without opposition on either side of the Chamber.

Mr. President, New Hampshire has but 12 miles of seacoast, and the ancient harbor of Portsmouth, immortalized by John Paul Jones and the Ranger, will probably never again become an important commercial port. My State has no selfish stake in this matter. My appeal is for the country and the country alone. I can not see a nation that leads all the countries of the world in wealth, in manufactures, in mining, and in agriculture lagging behind every other maritime nation in the matter of her merchant marine without exerting myself to restore the American flag to the oceans of the world. I have unbounded faith that the bill now before the Senate will become a law, and I believe that under its provisions the first great step toward the complete rehabilitation of the American merchant marine will be taken.

Mr. President, I have hastened in the remarks I have made so that the eloquent Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] might have abundant time in which to address the Senate on the bill.

Mr. BACON. Before the Senator from New Hampshire takes his seat I should like to ask him a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. GALLINGER. With pleasure.

Mr. BACON. I was called out of the Chamber for a moment while the Senator was addressing the Senate, and he may have given the information which I now seek. I desire to ask the Senator to point out the difference between this bill and the bill which was before the Senate in the last Congress, or, if he will permit me, I will ask him briefly if the difference which I now state is the difference.

If I recollect correctly, the bill in the last Congress was one which had two features in it. One of them was similar to the one in this bill. In addition to that, however, there was the feature which gave a subsidy to ships according to the tonnage of the ships and without reference to the particular country to which they might go, or the country between which and this country they might do business. In other words, ships were classified according to tonnage, and from whatever port in the United States they sailed or to whatever port in any other country they sailed they were paid according to tonnage, and possibly the number of voyages. I have forgotten whether the number of voyages was put in. I do not think the number of voyages was in, but they were paid by the year, according to tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. This bill, as I understand, has no such feature in it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all. I will say to the Senator that the bill originally passed by the Senate not only provided means for establishing ocean mail lines, but it also had the cargo feature——

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Which the Senator alludes to; and the Senator states it correctly.

Mr. BACON. My recollection is somewhat indistinct, but that is my general recollection.

Mr. GALLINGER. This bill is simply designed to put these steamship lines under the general mail law of 1891, being an enlargement of the provisions of that law so far as compensation to second-class vessels is concerned.

Mr. BACON. The particular point to which I wish to direct the Senator's attention, so that he may answer it now, is this: The purpose is to pay for the running of mail steamers between this country and certain designated countries?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the purpose.

Mr. BACON. Is it not a general bill which would be available to ships that were already running between this country and those to which the new ships might be directed?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all. The routes are stated in the bill.

Mr. BACON. South America?

Mr. GALLINGER. South America; that is, we expect lines to Brazil and Argentina, possibly to Uruguay, and across the Pacific to China, Japan, the Philippines, and Australasia.

Mr. BACON. I simply want to say this to the Senator, and it was really with a view to that suggestion that I made the inquiry: The bill provides that the contracts shall be equitably distributed between the Atlantic and Gulf and Pacific coasts. I do not know whether that language means that along the Atlantic coast, for instance, they shall be distributed equitably, or whether, even though all were concentrated at one point on the Atlantic coast, it would simply be charged up to the Atlantic coast in general, when the distribution is to be made equitably between the Atlantic, the Gulf, and the Pacific. I think the bill is somewhat indefinite in that particular.

I would suggest to the Senator, as the Atlantic coast is a very long one and a very important one, that the bill should be so amended that along the Atlantic coast the contracts should be equitably distributed. That is not so important on the Gulf coast, because it is comparatively small in mileage, and the places from which the ships could go are comparatively few. Galveston, Tex., and New Orleans and Mobile would probably be the three ports to which contracts would be limited. Whereas on the Atlantic coast, extending from Maine to Florida, there is a stretch of probably 1,500 miles and a large number of ports, and yet under the language of this bill, as it now stands, all of the contracts might be made for ships running from one particular port.

While I do not now venture to offer any amendment, I hope the Senator will take into consideration the importance of so changing the phraseology as to make the distribution along the Atlantic coast equitable.

The same thing might be said with reference to the Pacific coast. Of course the ports there are comparatively few, and it is not so important that the phraseology should be made explicit in that regard, although, of course, if Senators representing those particular sections, either the Gulf or the Pacific coast, desire that, I should think it entirely appropriate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will say in response to the distinguished Senator from Georgia that I shall be pleased to confer with him on the point he has raised. The matter, however, is in the discretion of the Post-Office Department absolutely, and I feel sure that there will be no massing of lines at any one given point. In fact, we do not expect to establish very many, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. BACON. Our experience has been that when it is left to the discretion of some governmental officer as to the distribution of the various favors of the Government not many of them come down our way. For that reason I should like to have something a little more explicit, something which will be directory rather than discretionary.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very sorry indeed if there has been any discrimination against the Senator's section of the country.

Mr. BACON. I am not referring to the Post-Office Department in that regard particularly; in fact, I should disclaim that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the point raised by the Senator can easily be overcome by a slight amendment, and we will look it over.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Did I correctly understand the Senator to state that the ships provided under this bill would be required very largely to be built and that the existing lines, as a rule, would not come under the bill as he proposes it?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that there may be some steamships that would be available—from two to four in the Pacific Ocean; but those are all that I can think of now.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. As a rule it would be necessary to build new ships?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, we would have to build new ships.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. GALLINGER. With pleasure.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire whether I am correct in my assumption that the cost of this service would be approximately $3,800,000 a year?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think that with the present subvention that is being paid for ocean mail carriage it would be a little over $4,000,000, but it would be reduced by the withdrawal from certain noncontract steamship companies and foreign steamship companies of money now paid to them. The exact amount of the reduction I would not like to say, but I should think about $4,000,000, including what we are now paying, would be the amount.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Did I understand the Senator to say that about twenty-seven ships would be required for this service?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the best calculation I can make. Possibly it might require thirty.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Am I correct in my understanding that each one of those ships will cost about $1,000,000?

Mr. GALLINGER. I should say that the Senator's figures are about right for the smaller ships, but the larger ships will cost more.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator whether, as supplementary to this legislation and in addition to it, for of course I would not expect the Senator to abandon this bill, he would not favor a provision of law that the United States should in the shipyards of the country contract for the construction of twenty or thirty such ships, costing a million dollars each, with a view to further extending the ocean mail service of the country, and with a view to furnishing a part of the auxiliary system of ships now urgently needed by the Navy?

Let me say here that I understand that the General Staff of Army, called upon some time since to state what auxiliary ships would be necessary in case the United States were called upon to defend its insular possessions against a strong force, made a report to the effect that 228 ships of about 6,500 tons capacity, costing a million dollars each, would be required for cruisers, transports, scouts, and other service in case of actual war.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have not yet got through with my statement, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg pardon.

Mr. NEWLANDS. So it seems absolutely essential that we should have this force to properly support the fighting ships of the Navy and make them efficient in case of war. But the Navy is just as destitute now of such auxiliary ships and would be as helpless in war as an army would be without the quartermaster or commissary department.

I ask the Senator, in addition, whether it would not be wise to commence building such ships as a part of our Navy—thirty of them would cost say $30,000,000, as against the $40,000,000 which the Senator's project will cost in a period of ten years—and in time of peace turn over those ships at a moderate rental to private corporations for the purpose of conducting these expeditions into commerce and establishing lines not now established; and whether in connection with such ships we could not establish a naval reserve which would be a training school for our Navy?

I believe the Senator realizes that one of the difficulties our Navy has now is in getting the men to man the ships because of the decline of our merchant marine.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if it were not for the fact that the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] is to address the Senate on this question, and we are anxious to hear him, I would answer the Senator from Nevada at greater length than I will do at the present time.

I will say to the Senator that if he will help us pass this bill, which is the first step toward rehabilitating the merchant marine, we will consider something else later on. I do not believe the Government of the United States is going into the renting business; that it is going to build ships and rent them out to private citizens. It is very possible that private citizens would not want to rent them. Then we would have the Senator's ships rusting at their anchors at the docks in New York, San Francisco, Puget Sound, Boston, and elsewhere. I think the Senator will want to look over that matter very carefully before he seriously urges it upon the Senate. It is to my mind a form of Government ownership without the merit that the subject in its larger aspects possesses.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I do not intend to reply to the Senator at length, but I wish to call his attention simply to one thing. He has stated that he does not believe the Government of the United States will be prepared to enter into the renting business, but I assume that the Senator does recognize the fact that the United States Government ought to be controlled by business considerations in entering into a matter of this kind. I should like to call his attention to the fact that the thirty ships called for by this service will cost $30,000,000 only, and that in ten years this service, at the rate of $4,000,000 annually, will cost the nation $40,000,000, and that in the one case, by the expenditure of the lesser amount, we would have the ships as a national asset, while in the other case, after expending a larger amount, we would have nothing. It is hardly fair, it seems to me, to assume that if a private steamship company can rent those ships for a moderate rent it will not enter upon this work, and meanwhile we will have the ships ready in the emergency of war, with trained men upon them to meet such emergency.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I shall simply add that I do not at the present moment see merit in the Senator's suggestion, but I will be pleased to talk it over with him some time.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has made such a complete, exhaustive, and able presentation of the case that it seems superfluous to attempt to add anything to his argument, nor can it be done. But I am so earnest in my belief in this policy that I am anxious to be on record in support of it, not only to the extent advocated by the Senator from New Hampshire, but to the largest and fullest extent which will make a subsidized policy for the United States, and have auxiliary cruisers and a merchant marine as good as that of any other country in the world.

It is a singular fact that this question has been before Congress now for more than half a century, and while it has at times received temporary attention and some support, nevertheless of late years every effort which would practically put an American merchant marine upon the ocean has failed.

Every endeavor to encourage the building and maintenance of an American merchant marine by Government subsidies has been defeated for years. The word "subsidy" has become an epithet of political reproach. To secure any consideration for this system, so vital to our future commercial relations with the world, we have to adopt other and more euphonious terms for the same thing. "The carriage of the mails" has not yet become unpopular. "To increase the efficiency of the postal service" is still permissible in political discussions. That our position upon the ocean, both the Atlantic and Pacific, is lamentable everybody admits. The effort to remedy it by the methods practiced by both free-trade and protective nations is defeated year after year. We have been trying now for a quarter of a century other schemes than subsidies until our flag has almost disappeared from the ports of the world, until our commerce is carried under foreign flags, and until we take out of the pockets of American workingmen $200,000,000 a year to pay to aliens. This bill reduces the proposition to its simplest terms and meets only the most acute situation in our foreign commerce. In 1891 a bill was passed granting $4 a mile outward bound for the carriage of mails to 20-knot ships and $2 a mile to 16-knot ships. Under that we managed to get four steamships on the Atlantic Ocean and good lines to the West Indies. American enterprise, always ready to enter upon any field in competition with any people, tried the Pacific Ocean. The opportunities were great, and so was the competition. There was the whole Pacific coast of South America, and there were also Hawaii, the Philippine Islands, Australasia, and the Orient. Sixteen-knot ships were practicable for this traffic. Fifteen American steamers were built and entered into this trade under the law of 1891 of $2 a mile for carrying the mails. They had to compete, first, with the subsidized ships of Great Britain and Germany, and, lastly, those of Japan. But they were struggling against something quite as serious as foreign subsidies. The $2 a mile carried with it the requirement that the ships should be American built and manned by Americans and run according to American laws. We have rightly and properly taken good care legislatively of our sailors, and prescribed a bill of fare upon which they shall be fed. The labor unions have rightly and properly taken care of their wages. The result is that the cost in wages and food to run American ships under American conditions across the Pacific is double that of European or Japanese steamers. Our people kept up this unequal contest until they had practically exhausted their capital and were compelled to retire from the South American, the Australasian, the Chinese, and the Japanese trade. Of the fifteen ships seven are laid off or have been sold to foreigners, their American crews have been discharged, and Malays and Lascars have taken their place. It is humiliating and injurious to our commerce that our mails, instead of going directly from our ports to the ports of South America, should travel around the world in ships of foreign nations; that our diplomatic correspondence, the secrets of which might be of the utmost importance, should be subject to the supervision of the postal laws and postal authorities of our rivals, and, possibly, of our enemies; that our communications in this roundabout service should take twice as long as they would if sent direct.

The law of 1891, as originally drafted by the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], provided for $6 a mile mail pay for 20-knot steamers and $4 for those of 16-knots. This schedule was changed in the House by the doctrinaires to its present rate of $4 and $2, which has proved such a tragic failure. Had the wise purpose of the Maine Senator [Mr. FRYE] and the Senate Committee on Commerce been adopted we would now have a merchant marine worthy of our country and an auxiliary fleet equal to the needs of our ships of war.

Under the broad, enlightened, and patriotic inspiration of the southern statesmen who at that time controlled the Government we began, as far back as 1845, an enlightened system under which was the promise of an American merchant marine. During the Administration of President Polk it was so far perfected that American capital felt safe in embarking upon the competition of the ocean, and the steamships called the Collins Line were built. They soon gained the record for speed, and increased the name and fame of American steamships. Our position in the Atlantic trade between our country and Europe was such that we were carrying one-half the tonnage and competition had reduced the rates from $35 to $20 a ton, thereby giving our manufacturers a chance in the European markets. But in the early fifties there grew up a hostile feeling against Government encouragement to a mercantile marine on this side of the ocean, while sentiment increased on the other side among all maritime nations in favor of government assistance. We withdrew our subsidies; England increased hers. The American line went into bankruptcy, the British bought our ships for a song, and raised the rates of freight, and we became, so far as commercial mastery of the ocean was concerned, the laughing stock of the world.

After Government aid was withdrawn Commodore Vanderbilt made a characteristically gallant effort to compete for the Atlantic traffic. He captured and held the speed record, but found that no individual, no matter how great his resources or his talents, could successfully fight for his flag against foreign rivals who had, in subsidies, the treasuries of their governments behind them, while he could hope for no aid from his own to so equalize conditions as to give him a fair field and a fighting chance.

Now, why this change of policy? The same arguments then prevailed which we have heard every year since down to to-day—that a few firms or a few corporations would be supported out of the Treasury of the United States. Building and running ocean steamers is not within the capital or capacity of individuals, nor can it be done by many corporations. The number of ships necessary to carry on this commerce must be limited. The important point is this: Shall the Government create conditions where American capital can live, can dot the ocean with American steamers, can put the American flag as it was once, in every port of the world; can carry American products in American ships, and can make the captain and the officers of every American vessel active agents for the promotion and sale of the products of American labor in the competitive ports of South America, Australasia, China, and other eastern countries? Shall our communications with the islands we have acquired—Hawaii and the Philippines—be maintained under our own flag, or subject to our friendly or hostile relations with other powers? Because the American farmer is protected in his wool against Australian and South American competition and in the other products of his fields and of his labor, we do not say that that legislation is for the people of a class. Because the iron worker, steel worker, coppersmith, silversmith, goldsmith, and artificer in wool, cotton, wood, and other fabrics are protected by tariff against pauper competition, we do not say that this legislation is for the benefit of capital and labor engaged in these industries. We say, wisely and patriotically, that such legislation is to enable Americans to be fed and clothed by Americans, to enable American labor to live under conditions different from and better than those which prevail in other countries. It is to make our country self-sustaining in every necessity and almost every luxury; it is to promote and encourage the skill of our artisans and the active employment of our capital that we may successfully compete with industrial rivals in other countries. Now, having subsidized Pacific railroads to go over the mountains to connect the Pacific and Atlantic coasts, having spent hundreds of millions to improve rivers and waterways for our internal trade, and harbors for our foreign commerce, we balk at the same policy that we may reach under equal conditions competitive markets outside of our own country.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York will kindly suspend while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2982) to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from New York will proceed.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, one would think to hear the frantic appeals for economy, based upon the alleged frightful cost of this encouragement to an American merchant marine, that we were depleting the Treasury by the appropriation of sums of unequaled magnitude. The profit to the Government on our ocean mail service is $3,600,000 a year. The cost under this bill at the maximum would not exceed that sum. For that sum it would give us American lines to South American ports, Australasia, and the Orient. If we should have a general bill which would place us on equal terms with Great Britain, Germany, France, and Japan on both the Atlantic and Pacific, the outside cost per annum would not equal the cost of a single battle ship.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator always speaks entertainingly and instructively. I should like to ask him if he has stopped to think about the spectacle we will present when the Panama Canal is completed, an undertaking that is going to cost somewhere from $200,000,000 to $500,000,000? It impresses itself upon the minds of some of us that it will be the greatest humiliation that we have ever suffered when foreign steamships pass through that canal flying foreign flags and scarcely an American merchant marine vessel will be seen. Doubtless battle ships and American yachts will pass through, and now and then a merchant ship. The canal will be built practically for the benefit of other nations than our own.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, I am glad of the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire. The greatest industrial accomplishment of modern times is to be this union of the Atlantic and the Pacific. It is to revolutionize the commerce of the world; it is to change the ocean routes; it is to build up new commercial centers and to cause others to decay. It is to accomplish infinitely more than did the Suez Canal, because of the infinitely greater opportunities there are upon our Pacific coast, in South America, hardly yet developed, and in the Orient, where we hope to have the open door.

It will be built, so the engineer says, in six years. It will cost us, the engineer says, about $400,000,000, and then it will be the United States' contribution to the world.

Its benefits are recognized by all the world. The commerce of the nations will follow this new route which will reduce so greatly time and cost in the carriage of interchanges between the Atlantic and Pacific. We will have the glory of this marvel of the liberality of a great nation and the genius of its engineers, but if we have no merchant marine other countries will reap the larger portion of its advantages. Our Atlantic and Pacific coasts will be the more easily defended by our fleet, but except on a man-of-war the canal will rarely see our flag and our people will not reap the rich harvest of the commerce which will flow through its waters.

We are now the second naval power in the world. The Government asks for four new battle ships, and to complete the programme we should have them, and we should complete the programme. A large war fleet promotes peace and prevents war, but it has other uses in time of war, as harbors and coasts are fairly well protected by long-range guns, torpedoes, and submarines. The primary object of a great fleet is to protect the commerce of the country, but we have no commerce under our own flag to protect. We are without vessels or merchant marine which can become auxiliaries to the fleet by which the battle ships themselves can be protected. The policy of Great Britain, Germany, France, and Japan has built up a merchant marine which is virtually part of their navy. They can call upon these ships, as Great Britain did during the Boer war, as we did upon the four ships which we had during the Spanish war. During the Boer war Great Britain took her best ships, because the navy had a right to claim them, out of the American trade, and we suffered millions of dollars by it—I think about $80,000,000.

They took them out to carry troops and munitions of war to South Africa. Admiral Dewey has estimated the number of vessels which ordinarily in times of peace would be in the merchant marine that are necessary in time of war to accompany a fleet of battle ships, cruisers, scouts, torpedo-boat destroyers, and torpedo boats. There should be in every maritime nation a merchant marine large enough to carry on commerce after the navy has been supplied with its requirements. If I reckon correctly, there are to-day in the whole merchant marine of the United States, including the coastwise service, hardly enough boats to meet a war emergency, and our coastwise service would have to be fatally crippled.

The glad news came to us on Saturday that our fleet of battle ships had passed safely through the dangerous Straits of Magellan and were upon the broad Pacific. The morning papers are full of the joy and enthusiasm with which our South American brethren on the Pacific are emulating the hospitality of those on the Atlantic in the reception of the fleet. But there is a fly in the amber, a crack in the diamond, and a cloud in the ruby of our national pride. Many of the colliers and supply ships are chartered from foreign nations because our merchant marine could not furnish them. This could not happen with any other maritime naval power. There are thirty-seven colliers accompanying the battle-ship fleet to the Pacific. Only nine of these are American, while twenty-eight are chartered from foreigners. In time of war the difficulty of securing two-thirds of our auxiliary steamers from foreign powers would prove an almost fatal handicap. It is a serious question if neutrals, from whom alone we could hire ships, would be permitted to grant us this assistance. Our gallant sailors would be compelled to fight with a crippled arm.

One of the most significant journeys ever made was that of our Secretary of State, Mr. Root, to the South American republics. It was far more important than the fabled voyages of Ulysses and quite as picturesque. He removed prejudices of the statesmen and people of the countries south of us who had theretofore thought our interference in their behalf was to conquer or dominate them. At all the ports and capitals this most level-headed, capable, and tactful American cemented North and South American friendship.

But what do we or they gain? War is very remote. The Monroe doctrine is too firmly established for European aggression. The whole sum and substance of closer relations between North and South America is reciprocal trade. It was mortifying to the Secretary of State to have to report, as he did in his great speech at Kansas City on his return, that as the war ship on which he was sailed through the crowded shipping of every port the flags of Great Britain, Germany, France, Sweden, Norway, and Japan were dipped in salute, and only once in all those fleets was seen at the masthead the American flag. Why? Because while we spend a hundred millions a year on the Navy, a hundred millions a year on the Army, forty millions a year in dredging harbors, and one hundred and forty millions a year for pensions and other millions in forestry and reclamation, yet we are driven off the ocean by the clamor that $3,600,000 for a pacific fleet would smash the Treasury. One of our consuls reports that in the harbor of Chile last year were about 18,000,000 tons of shipping, of which, including sailing vessels and everything that could float, the United States had 135,000 tons.

The Japanese are the wonders of the past half century. I received at my law office in Peekskill forty-odd years ago most unexpectedly a commission as minister to Japan. I had been appointed and confirmed without my knowledge owing to the friendly offices of Mr. Secretary Seward. At that time Japan had but few ports open to the world, her navy was composed of junks, her army equipped with bows, arrows, and spears, and her government a feudal system like that of Europe in the eleventh century. The Japanese, though living under the oldest of monarchies, are the most progressive of peoples. They are willing to adopt anything from any country if it can be proven to be better than their own. These Orientals differ from all other Orientals in not being bound by traditions or prejudices. In forty-two years they have advanced as far as western Europe has in six hundred. They sent out a commission of their ablest men to study other civilizations and governments. Their reverence for their Emperor, which is their religion, was such that while they retained him they made him a constitutional monarch restrained by a representative parliament. They established a free press on American lines. They also, after investigation, built up an educational system on American lines of common schools, high schools, colleges and universities.

They adopted from England, the greatest of maritime powers, their navy and justified their judgment when they swept the Russian fleet from the ocean. They chose the German system for their army, and Port Arthur and Manchuria are the trophies of their broad-mindedness. They even sent a commission to find if other religions were better than their own. The commission, unhappily, visited only the great cities, and did not come in touch with what Christianity has really done for civilization, humanity, and the uplifting of peoples, but seeing the amount of drunkenness, immorality and crime there was in the cities of Europe they went back and reported against any change in religion. We believe ourselves to be the most progressive people in the world, and yet we are bound by prejudices at which the Japanese would laugh.

In 1812 Andrew Jackson defeated Wellington's veterans from behind the cotton bales at New Orleans, and in 1837 he smashed the United States Bank from the White House at Washington. He became and is one of the heroes of our history. These two achievements are linked together in the American mind. The result of the latter is that we refuse to study the systems of Germany, France and Great Britain, which prevent panics, and stand by General Jackson. Free-trade doctrinaires have captured the outpost of the American merchant marine and the trade of the ocean, and because of our reverence for the men who did it we talk of the policy of free ships, which has been tried and failed, we talk of tonnage duties which, under our treaties, are impossible, and decline to adopt the system which makes Great Britain the master of the seas and which has built up the German mercantile marine in the last twenty years to the second place in the commerce of the world.

Japan ten years ago made up her mind that if she was to take her place among commercial nations she must have a merchant marine. She tried free ships and the other devices advanced by doctrinaires for our guidance and then discovered she must build her own ships at her own dockyards, and her merchant marine must be Japanese from start to finish. So she commenced to subsidize with no prejudice, no fears, but accepted the wise, modern doctrine that "the best is good enough for us no matter who invented it." So to-day her merchant marine is three times as great as it was nine years ago. She is gradually dominating the Pacific. She has bankrupted our Pacific fleet, and is forcing England to take new and additional steps to protect her trade between China and India.

We are now about one hundred millions of people. The genius of our inventors, the skill of our mechanics, and our exhaustless supply of raw material are constantly creating a larger and larger surplus which must be sold abroad. Congestion imperils capital, wages, and production at home. Fifty years from now the question of population and its profitable employment will become very acute. If our across-ocean commerce is to be held in the grip of these exploded prejudices the condition will be more than acute. It will be perilous. I am old enough to remember when our clipper ships were first in speed, and with speed foremost in tonnage, and we were equal to every maritime nation on the ocean and in the ports of the world. I am old enough to remember when, with the supremacy of steam, the subsidized Collins Line maintained and increased our favorable position and secured 50 per cent of the tonnage across the Atlantic, and young enough to know that while the tonnage has enormously increased, only 9 per cent of it is carried under the American flag. I am old enough to remember when our flag disappeared from the ocean upon our merchant marine, and the free trade exultation for this triumph of its theories. I am young enough to remember, and not with pride, that when the whole world applauded the gaining of the ocean record on the Atlantic, it was for the Deutschland, a German ship under the German flag. I am young enough to remember that the Lusitania and the Mauretania were cheered for their marvels of architecture, of comfort, of capacity and of speed on both sides of the ocean, but they were British ships under the British flag, supported by a subsidy of $750,000 a year, with a postal payment of three hundred and fifty thousand a year beside.

Mr. President, I look upon this bill as purely a tentative effort to place us in our proper position commercially with our rivals. I believe it should be followed by a broad and comprehensive policy. We have the genius for invention; we have the architectural talent; we have the mechanical skill; we have the products, raw and manufactured, to compete successfully everywhere around this earth. Our necessity is the disposal of our surplus, the opportunity is the open market, and to win it we must have American ships, built by American labor in American shipyards, officered by American officers and manned by American sailors and bearing the American flag. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday next, immediately after the routine morning business, the bill now under consideration be further considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that on Thursday next, at the close of the routine morning business, the pending bill be further considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AMENDMENTS OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws be now laid before the Senate. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] desires to address the Senate on the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, in the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1907, on page 16, under the head of "Profit on circulation," the statement is made that approximately 97 per cent of the bonds on deposit as security for national-bank circulation on October 31, 1907, were 2 per cent consols of 1930 and 2 per cent Panama Canal bonds; that notes secured by these two classes of bonds are subject to a semi-annual tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent, and that the average price of 2 per cent consols in October, 1907, was about 105.

The bill under consideration authorizes national banks to issue notes upon State, municipal, and railroad bonds, but imposes rigid restrictions as to the character of these bonds, and notes secured by this class of bonds are made subject to a monthly tax of one-half of 1 per cent.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], in his speech delivered in the Senate a few days ago, stated that there were only about $2,000,000,000 worth of railroad bonds available as a basis of bank-note circulation under this act. I have before me a pamphlet issued by the Interstate Commerce Commission entitled "Statistics of Railroads in the United States for the Year Ending June 30, 1906." On page 61 of this pamphlet the statement is made that the total amount of railroad bonds of various descriptions outstanding on the 30th day of June, 1906, was $6,266,770,962, being an increase of $515,960,315 for the year 1906. Allowing the same increase for the year 1907 the present outstanding bonded indebtedness of the railroads should be about $7,000,000,000.

In other words, the standard fixed in the bill is so high that only a little over one-fourth of the railroad bonds outstanding are available to the banks as security for these notes. Railroad bonds of this select, high-class, gilt-edge character do not bear a rate of interest exceeding 4 or 4½ per cent, and command, under ordinary conditions, a good premium.

I have not been able to ascertain the total amount of State and municipal bonds at present outstanding, but it is safe to assume, that on account of the rigid requirements of this bill with reference to them, not more than two-thirds of those outstanding will be available as a basis of circulation under it. Of the entire issue of State, county, and municipal bonds outstanding in 1902, that being the last census report of this indebtedness, about two-thirds are from 3 to 4 per cent long-term bonds. These generally sell, in normal times, at a small premium.

The Comptroller of the Currency, in the report to which I have just referred, makes a calculation of the profits on bank circulation issued upon 2 per cent United States bonds, subject to a tax of one-half of 1 per cent per annum, and allowing 6 per cent for the use of the money invested in the purchase of these bonds, reaches the conclusion that there is a profit of 1 per cent on these notes.

In a speech made in the House of Representatives on the 4th day of February, of this year, Representative HILL, of Connecticut, who, I believe, is regarded in that body as an authority on banking and finance, employing the same method of calculation as the Comptroller, makes a calculation of the cost of bank notes based on 4 per cent municipal and railroad bonds subject to a tax of 6 per cent per annum and reaches the conclusion that instead of a profit, as in the case of notes issued on 2 per cent United States bonds, there will be an actual loss of about 3⅜ per cent.

A couple of weeks ago I addressed a communication to about twelve or fifteen leading bankers in North Carolina, inclosing a copy of this bill, and asking their opinion with regard to it. In their replies most of them lay great stress upon the cost of issue under such a law. Several of them, allowing 4 per cent income from bonds deposited with the Treasurer and 6 per cent interest on the money invested in their purchase, and adopting the Comptroller's method of calculation, estimate the cost of bank notes issued against this class of bonds at from 8½ to 9 per cent.

Mr. President, there is one important fact which will add greatly to the cost of bank notes issued upon railroad and municipal bonds which both Mr. HILL and the bankers to whom I have just referred did not take into consideration in their calculations. I refer to the fact that while Government bonds are nontaxable, municipal and railroad bonds are taxable, not only by the State, but by the county and the city in which the bank owning them is located. I do not know what is the general average of these combined taxes, taking the country as a whole, but I am confident it is not less than 1½ per cent. In many States I know it is in excess of that amount. In North Carolina it will average at least 2 per cent, and in the larger cities of that State, where the banks are chiefly located, it will average over 2 per cent. Allowing for these local taxes, the net income of a 4 per cent, or even a 4½ per cent, railroad or municipal bond is not materially, if any, greater than a 2 per cent nontaxble Government bond.

If this bill should become a law the great commercial banks of the East and North, especially those which at all times carry these select, high-class railroad and municipal bonds as a part of their permanent assets, or control them through their trust and insurance company affiliations or connections, may be able to issue notes on them without any material cost except the tax of 6 per cent per annum and the expense incident to their issue and redemption, estimated to be from one-half to two-thirds of 1 per cent. But, Mr. President, the commercial banks of the agricultural South and, perhaps, West do not carry these bonds as part of their permanent assets, because they can not afford to do it, and they have no trust or insurance company affiliations.

Bonds of this class may be attractive for investment in sections where the supply of money is usually in excess of the demand for money, but that is not the case in the South. While there is a greater demand in the South, as in the North, for money during the crop-moving season than during the crop planting and growing seasons, the crops of the South are expensive crops and their cultivation calls for vast sums of ready cash. Cotton is an expensive crop. Cane is an expensive crop. Tobacco is a still more expensive crop. And truck cropping is more expensive than either cane, tobacco, or cotton. This demand of the farmer in the spring and summer for planting and cultivating and in the fall and winter for harvesting and marketing his crops, together with the all-year-round demand of the merchant, the manufacturer, and the town builder strains to the utmost the limited resources of the banks of that section at all seasons of the year. The emergency is greatest in the fall and winter, but to a degree it continues throughout the year, there being practically no time when the supply of money, to any appreciable degree, exceeds the demand for money. With a steady and constant demand for practically all of their loanable funds at 6 per cent, it is obvious that these banks can not afford to invest in and carry as a part of their permanent assets high-class, low-interest-yielding securities.

Mr. President, we have in recent years issued a great many municipal bonds in the South, and our local banks sometimes buy these bonds, but almost invariably, except when they are bought by depository banks to be used as security for Government deposits, they buy them for the purpose of selling them again at a profit. They do not carry them, as I said before, as a permanent investment. It is a fact, which is a matter of common knowledge, that the great bulk of these bonds, especially the select class required by this bill, are purchased and held as investments by the great trust and insurance companies and savings banks of the East and North, and to some extent of the Middle West.

There are two ways in which the commercial banks of the agricultural sections can secure these bonds for use in increasing their bank-note circulation in times of emergency. One is to borrow them, as many of them did during the recent panic, for use as security for Government deposits, and pay for their use the usual rate of 2 per cent. The other is to buy them with money taken from their vaults.

There are two reasons why increased bank circulation secured in this way will not be profitable or beneficial either to the banks in these agricultural sections or the communities in which they are located. First, because it would add from 2 to 4 per cent to the cost of bank notes; and secondly, because while the general stock of money in the country at large would be increased, the amount in the particular section where the bank is located would not only not be increased, but, on the contrary, would be decreased precisely to the extent of the difference between the cost of these bonds and the amount of new notes allowed to be issued against them.

Mr. President, I have undertaken to show, and I think I have shown, taking the situation of the country at large and the conditions which surround the commercial banks, except possibly those in the great financial centers, where the supply of money is usually in excess of the demand, that bank notes issued against municipal and railroad bonds under the conditions imposed in this bill will cost ordinarily between 9 and 9½ per cent, and therefore could not be loaned at a reasonable profit at less than, say, 10 or 10½ per cent.

Now, if the municipal and railroad bonds required in this bill could be bought at par, if they carried full 6 per cent interest, and if they were not subject to taxation by the State and its subdivisions, on account of the tax imposed and the expense incident to their issue and redemption, the cost of bank notes secured by these bonds would still be between 6⅞ and 7 per cent, and they could not be loaned at the usual commercial rate of 6 per cent except at a loss of from two-thirds to 1 per cent, nor be loaned at a profit of 1 per cent, as in the case of notes secured by United States bonds, for less than 7⅞ per cent.

I have before me a letter from one of the leading bankers of North Carolina, in which, after declaring that circulation under this act will cost the banks of the South and West at least 8½ per cent, he asks the pertinent question: "If the banks have to pay these rates for this circulation, what will their borrowing customers have to pay, and what will a law-abiding banker do in a State like North Carolina, where the rate of interest is 6 per cent?" Mr. President, the laws of North Carolina not only fix the legal rate of interest at 6 per cent, but they impose heavy penalties and forfeitures if a greater rate is reserved for the use of money. The same is true of most of the Southern States, and perhaps of many other States of other sections of the country. So that the banks of North Carolina, and other States with like interest laws, could not, without violating these laws against usury, and incurring the risk of the penalties and forfeitures they prescribe, lend these notes without a certain loss of at least 1 per cent and a probable loss of from 3 to 4 per cent.

Mr. ALDRICH rose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. SIMMONS. I would prefer to present my argument consecutively, and if it will suit the Senator from Rhode Island just as well, I will ask him to withhold his interruption for the present.

Mr. President, I was glad to have the views I have been expressing confirmed by the resolutions recently adopted by the committee on commercial law of the Merchants' Association of New York and which were called to my attention by an editorial which appeared in the Observer, a newspaper of Charlotte, N. C., in its issue of Saturday last. The part of the resolutions to which I wish to call attention reads as follows:

Resolved, That this committee on bankruptcy and commercial law disapproves Senate bill No. 3023, entitled "A bill to amend the national banking laws," introduced by Senator ALDRICH, for the following reasons: * * * Second. The high tax which this bill proposes to levy upon the issue of emergency currency, and which in the last analysis would be paid by the borrower to the banks, when increased as it would be in practice at least one-third by reserve requirements, is not only unnecessary, but oppressive, and in this and other States would provoke an immediate disregard of the statutes against usury. It is not becoming that a great nation should fill its coffers from the necessities of borrowers; and it is manifestly improper to pass one law which offers inducements to the violation of another.

Undoubtedly, Mr. President, as the resolutions of this committee of the Merchants' Association of New York which I have just read declare, in the first instance this high charge will be against the banks, but in the last analysis the borrower, who in the case I have been discussing is the farmer, will have to pay it.

Because of its pertinent bearing upon this phase of this question, with the indulgence of the Senate, I wish to read a short extract from a letter received by me on the 11th of this month from Mr. Joseph G. Brown, president of the Citizens' National Bank, of Raleigh, N. C. Mr. Brown is not only one of the leading bankers of my State, but he is an able man and a great student of finance. He is known in banking circles throughout the country, having delivered several notable speeches at meetings of the National Bankers' Association. In this letter Mr. Brown says:

What we need to provide for is the handling of the crops at harvest time without the fearful advance in interest rates to which we have been subjected. The farmers are entitled to as low rates as are the bond dealers. At present, in the crop season the country banks call on their New York correspondents, the rate of interest is forced upward by the demand, and although the charge is against the banks, yet in the final analysis, the farmer has to pay it. A well-devised scheme would furnish needed currency at such a time at minimum cost and without delay, nor would the issue of this currency be regarded as an indication of weakness on the part of the bank. Whatever plan may be adopted ought to prevent the banks of one section being any longer placed entirely at the mercy of another, as heretofore—not only uncertain as to whether they can borrow the necessary funds, but uncertain as to whether their actual balances will be paid in cash if wanted.

Mr. President, the demand for an emergency currency is not of recent origin. The panic through which we have just passed did not create it, it merely emphasized it. This panic, though leaving widespread depression in its wake, has passed, and another will not be due in the ordinary course of events for many years to come. The present demand for an emergency currency is not to provide for conditions created by the late panic, but to supply the extraordinary demand which recurs during each autumn and winter for from two hundred to three hundred million dollars in spot cash to enable the farmers of the country to harvest and market their crops. To supply this demand of the farmer we need more money, but not a different kind of money, not a high-price money. Already we have several kinds of money in this country—gold and silver, gold certificates and silver certificates, United States notes, Treasury notes, and national-bank notes, all of it issued directly or indirectly by the Government, but there is not a single dollar of this money that can not, so far as the cost of its issue and flotation is concerned, be loaned at a profit at 6 per cent. This is the money with which the banks supply the daily demands of the merchant and the manufacturer, the mines and the railroads. This is the money with which the ordinary business of the country is done and there is enough to supply this demand in ordinary times.

It is now proposed by this bill to make another kind of money—a heavily taxed, high-priced money. A money which can not be issued upon a 6 per cent bond except at a cost of not less than from 6⅞ to 7 per cent, which can not be issued by the average bank upon a 4 per cent bond except at a cost of from 9 to 9½ per cent; a money which can not be issued and loaned at a profit by the banks of the agricultural sections for less than 8 or 10 per cent. If this bill is passed, this is the money which will be supplied to the farmer to meet the expenses incident to the picking and bailing of his cotton, to cutting and curing his tobacco, to gathering and housing his corn, and to harvesting and warehousing his wheat.

Mr. President, when the financial sky is overcast with clouds, when Wall street is filled with a surging mob, when the wires are burdened with demands for increased margins, and stocks are thrown upon the market in blocks, and the call for money is leaping from 10 to 20 per cent or more, the banks whose greed for profits, whose disregard of their duty to their depositors and to the public have made possible the speculative ventures and reckless gambles of which these unhealthy conditions of the market are but marked symptoms can afford to pay almost any price for money to stay the tempest which their departure from the principles of sound and safe banking has raised. The remedy for conditions like these does not lie in legislation, but in a return to sound and honest business methods and practices, and a situation thus created and fostered calls not so much for remedial as for punitive legislation—for legislation to remove the cause rather than to cure the disease.

The emergency to which we are addressing ourselves, or to which, in my judgment, we should address ourselves, is not an emergency caused by unhealthy business conditions, but is, as I have tried to show, a demand created by the wonderful productiveness of the American farmer, and the comparatively small profits of his occupation make high interest charges on the advances he requires to market his products burdensome and oppressive.

This bill is the response of the majority in Congress to the demand for more money to meet emergencies growing out of the great business activity during the crop-moving season. If it becomes the law in its present shape it will be a confession on the part of the Government that it can not supply this demand with a bond-secured currency except at an exorbitant and usurious rate of interest. Mr. President, there is no greater handicap on the business of a people than high-priced money. It is a burden upon thrift and industry. It is a tax upon every transaction of the people where money is used as an agency of exchange. If this usurious charge is the result of individual greed, it is odious; if it is the result of economic conditions, it is deplorable; if it is the result of burdens imposed by the Government on the money of the people, whether in the form of taxes or otherwise, it is indefensible. If this bill becomes law currency issued under it will be high-priced money, not because of individual greed or economic conditions, but because of burdens imposed by law upon its issue. Every cent which the farmer or business man may have to pay for this money in excess of 6 per cent would be an exaction by way, not of interest, but of tax.

The power of taxation, Mr. President, is the greatest power conferred by the people upon the Government, and it is also in its misuse the most dangerous. I have no sympathy with the modern-day fad that every abuse can be remedied, every evil cured, and every needed reform obtained by resort to the taxing power. It is a power which ought, under all circumstances, to be grudgingly used, and never used where the object in view can be attained in any other practicable way.

Mr. President, the high tax imposed by this bill upon the currency it authorizes is not only objectionable because it will make high-priced money, but it is objectionable because it is not necessary to accomplish the object and purposes for which it is imposed. If this bill allowed notes secured by municipal and railroad bonds to be issued in the discretion of the banks, both as to time and amount of issue, as in the case of notes issued on United States bonds, a high tax would be necessary to prevent their issue when not needed to meet an emergency and to force their retirement when the emergency which called them forth had passed. But that is not the case here. This bill expressly confers upon the Secretary of the Treasury the power to determine when these notes may be issued. Not a dollar can be issued by any bank until it has been officially determined by the financial head of the Government that they are necessary to meet an urgent business demand. This bill also expressly provides not only that the amount of these notes outstanding shall never exceed $500,000,000, but it provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall fix the amount within this limitation that may at any given time be issued. Not one dollar can be issued in excess of the amount the Secretary officially finds to be needed. There is, therefore, no necessity for a high tax so far as the amount of issue and time of issue are concerned, and every consideration of wisdom, expediency, and justice is against an unnecessary tax on them while the emergency exists and while they are honestly at work relieving the situation and keeping down the rate of interest by making money plentiful. The only need for a high tax is to force their retirement when the emergency is over, and we know from experience that the stress is generally over in three or four months, though in cases of stringency, culminating in panic, the incident depression may continue long afterwards. Why, then, would not a small tax during the first three or four months of the life of these notes, with a tax of 6 per cent ever thereafter until redeemed, accomplish the object in view, without saddling the business of the country while the emergency is on with an unnecessary and burdensome rate of interest?

In this country the right to make money rests with the Government. It is a sovereign function. The people have divested themselves of this function and vested it in the Government to be exercised for their benefit. Not a dollar of money can be issued except by the Government or its authorized agents. Our people will not tolerate an unsound currency, but they demand as cheap money, as respects the interest rate, as any commercial nation enjoys. They are entitled to a 6 per cent rate for all purposes. If it is impracticable to supply the people with low-rate emergency money through a bond-secured currency, guaranteed by the Government, sooner or later recourse will have to be had to the alternative system of asset currency. I do not advocate in present conditions an asset currency, although such a currency, properly safeguarded, is not a bugbear to me. I do not regard it as undemocratic, as some do. If it is undemocratic to advocate such a system of currency, then there are a great many undemocratic Democrats in this country to-day. But I do believe that an asset emergency currency, limited in amount, covered by a reserve, the same as is required for deposits, secured by a lien, the same as given to depositors, and reenforced by a guaranty fund raised by a tax on the issue of all the banks sufficiently large to force its withdrawal when not needed in response to the demands of business would be an infinitely better currency system than the one provided in this bill, and that in addition to giving the people a safe, cheap, and elastic currency it would bring about a degree of cooperation and supervision by and between the banks of issue which would do ten times more than Government supervision now does toward the protection of depositors and the establishment and enforcement of conservative and safe banking.

Mr. President, recognizing that the majority party in Congress have made up their mind to work out this problem of emergency money through the medium of a bond-secured currency along the lines of the bill now under discussion, and that all the minority can do, if anything, must be done by way of amendment and suggestion, I have largely confined myself in what I have said to an effort to point out the objections which occur to my mind to its main provisions. These objections may be minimized or partly overcome by amendments, but I do not believe they can be entirely removed from any possible emergency system based on a bond-secured currency. The objections which I have made to the excessive cost of circulation may be overcome in part, as I have endeavored to show, by a reduction of the tax imposed, or by substituting for a level tax of 6 per cent for the whole time the notes are outstanding a comparatively small tax for the first three or four months and a heavy one thereafter. At the proper time I shall propose an amendment to this effect. The objections on the ground that the so-called "country banks" do not invest in the class of securities specified and would have to buy them in remote sections and that the net result would be contraction instead of expansion of local currency could, in part, be eliminated by reducing the reserve allowed to be deposited in reserve cities to the minimum required for purposes of exchange and requiring the remainder of their legal reserve to be kept in their own vaults and permitting them to use bonds of the class denominated in the bill for one-half of the latter amount. This would give these banks interest on one-half the reserve in their vaults and supply them with securities to the extent of 5 per cent of their deposits as a basis of note issue in cases of emergency. Both of these objections might be largely, if not altogether, overcome by extending the list of securities against which these notes may be issued to high-class commercial paper, as is done in Germany and in some other progressive nations, but I do not advocate this suggestion as a part of a system such as this bill proposes, and if I did I would not discuss it now, because there is no possibility of its adoption at this time. I am utterly opposed to the use of railroad bonds as a basis of bank circulation, and while I shall not enter upon any discussion of this question now, I wish to say at the proper time if no one else does so I shall offer an amendment to strike these bonds out of the bill.

Mr. President, I am glad to be able to give my approval to one provision of this bill, which I regard as being of great importance, and which it seems to me may be of great benefit in solving this emergency currency problem. I refer to the provision which removes all limitation from the retirement of national-bank circulation. If this provision had been adopted years ago, I believe our bank currency would have played a more beneficial part in our monetary system, both as respects volume and elasticity. Our national-bank circulation has never at any time made the slightest response to the business demands of the country except under Government pressure and inducement. During the last thirty years, except under the galvanizing influence of what was tantamount to Government subsidy, our bank circulation has dwindled until it has become at times almost a negligible quantity in our monetary system.

In 1882 there were only $23,000,000 more of these notes outstanding than in 1866, only about two years after the inauguration of our national banking system. In 1891 there were $150,000,000 less outstanding than in 1882, and in 1900 the number of these notes were only about the same as in 1866. It is true that since 1903 over $270,000,000 have been added to our national-bank circulation, but this increase has not been a voluntary increase. It has not been in response to the business demands of the country, exigent as they have been at times during this period, but in response to great governmental solicitation, pressure, and inducement. To secure this increase the Government had to loan to the banks by way of deposits practically dollar for dollar. In order to induce them to increase their circulation it sold to the banks the recent issue of Panama Canal bonds and 3 per cent certificates at sums less in many instances than were offered by individuals, and in effect loaned them the money, without interest, with which to pay for them. And yet, Mr. President, during all these years there has probably been no time when these banks could not, during most of the year, especially during the fall and winter months, when the demand for currency is always great and the rate of interest higher, have used these notes at a profit of at least from 1 to 2 per cent.

I may be mistaken, Mr. President, but I am strongly inclined to believe that the reason our national banks have not to a larger degree taken advantage of the privileges of issue conferred by the act of their creation and more readily responded to the needs of business has been largely due to the fact that the three and then the nine million dollars per month limitation imposed by law on the retirement of their circulation made it impossible to adequately retire these notes when they were no longer profitable or needed.

I do not profess to know enough about practical finance to have an opinion on this subject entirely satisfactory to myself, but I do not believe the removal of this limitation will invite undue contraction, and I have a hope which is but little removed from belief that it will impart a life and elasticity to our Government bond-secured circulation which would give to the people a cheaper currency than that authorized by the bill under consideration and which, by a readier response to the emergency demands of trade and commerce, will contribute to the solution of the problem which now confronts us.

Mr. President, we have at this time an abundance of money to do the ordinary business of the country. We have a larger per capita circulation than any other commercial nation in the world except France. France has more than we have and has to have, because in that country business is done largely upon bank notes instead of upon bank credits, as in this country. We have twice as much money per capita as Great Britain, we have seven times as much as Japan, four times as much as Russia, and $10 per capita more than Germany. On the 1st day of February, 1908, we had a per capita of $35.61. Eliminating every one of our national-bank notes, our stock of money per capita would still be larger than any other commercial nation except France.

But, Mr. President, for this great blessing, and it is a great blessing, we owe little thanks to our statutory monetary system. The output of our mines and the international balances of trade in our favor have been our financial salvation. They have done for us everything except to supply us with an emergency currency. That can only be supplied by legislation. Trade balances are uncertain. The output of gold is uncertain. Good fortune, which in the recent years of our abounding prosperity has smiled upon us and saved us, may at any time desert us. Our recent experience should admonish us that it is the part of wisdom to put our financial house in order against a possible adverse turn of the uncertain wheel of fate. We can not with common prudence much longer delay a general remodeling of our amazingly incongruous monetary system.

The paramount question which will confront us in remodeling our monetary system will be whether the Government or the banks shall furnish the money of the people. It is folly to talk about the Government not going into the banking business. The Government is already in the banking business up to its armpits. Besides its collections for current expenses, it has on deposit in the Treasury over $900,000,000 in gold and more than half this amount in silver. It has outstanding $1,525,000,000 in paper notes, for which it is solely responsible, and it has nearly $250,000,000 of loanable funds. The Government is already in the banking business, and I believe will remain in the banking business, but it ought to do this business on sound banking principles.

Mr. President, the experience of commercial nations shows that $1 in gold will amply support $3 of paper currency. Our gold reserve of $150,000,000 is now supporting more than that amount, but we have about $750,000,000 worth of gold in the Treasury which is supporting only a like number of paper dollars. The $150,000,000 in gold is overburdened, but the seven hundred and fifty millions is carrying only about one-third of the burden it is capable of carrying and should be made to carry, if necessary to supply an adequate amount of currency.

In my opinion, this vast hoard of gold, now approximating ten hundred million dollars, should be converted into a redemption fund and with notes drawn against it we should pay off the several kinds of paper currency which we have now outstanding and for which the Government is solely responsible. Upon the basis of three, or even two and one-half, dollars of paper to one of gold, there would be an ample margin left for an additional issue of $500,000,000, as provided in the substitute of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], which could be loaned to the banks as emergency required in amounts and at a rate of interest within fixed limits, to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury. In this way the Government could, through the rate of interest fixed from time to time, largely control movements tending to undue expansion or contraction of the currency. Such a system would give the country an ample supply of money to do the ordinary business of the country, covered by gold, backed by the aggregate wealth of the nation, with an elasticity which would respond to the requirements of business and afford ample protection against undue inflation or contraction.

Mr. WHYTE. As I do not intend, Mr. President, to vote for any of the financial measures now under debate before the Senate, I feel it is due to my position that I should state with laudable brevity the reason which impels me to pursue the course I have indicated. I am a firm believer in the theory that there is a periodicity in commercial crises, as there is in crimes and epidemics affecting the physical body. They come at stated periods, but not with the regularity and exactness of the chronometer in the measuration of time in point of days or years, but with a certainty as indisputable as that of death. If I may use a vulgar expression, the country, at periods, intoxicated with the exuberance of its prosperity, gets on a monumental "jag" and runs riot for a time in the wildest speculation—gigantic stock gambling; investing enormous sums in the most impracticable enterprises which promise fabulous profits; living in the most profligate extravagance; building castles in the air to-day with no thought of the morrow until the bubble bursts; money has vanished; credit has become top-heavy and overturns, then it wakes up to a realization that it has been on a financial debauch, and there comes the tedious work of restoring, in sackcloth and ashes, the shattered constitution, the strengthening of the muscles, the purifying of the blood, the quieting of the nerves, and by a steady, yet sure process financial health is eventually restored and the people once more move on a new road to commercial prosperity. You may talk of the lack of elastic currency in such times, but I defy you to find in any country on the face of the globe such an elasticity as dominates the American character in bearing the ills they have on such occasions, yet rising superior to them all, regenerated and resolved to build anew the fortunes which they have lost in commercial disaster. The year 1907 has been simply the reproduction of the "moving pictures" of 1837, 1857, 1873, and 1893, through all of which I have passed in my long and busy life. The panic of 1837 followed the withdrawal of the Federal deposits from the Bank of the United States and opened the door for the creation of a multitude of State banks, which issued enormous amounts of paper money, giving impulse to unbridled speculation, of which the South Sea bubble was a fair prototype, and the danger of the situation was so apparent that there followed, as a natural consequence, a financial collapse.

Congress met in special session in September, 1837, and $10,000,000 of Treasury notes were authorized to be issued, and merchants were not to be pressed on their revenue bonds. Emergency relief had this extent; no more. The period from 1837 down to 1846 was one of crucial trial and economy to all classes of citizens in the reduction of their expenses and payment of their previously contracted debts. Maryland, my native State, which had been free from taxation, was debtor for long-term bonds, enormous in volume, issued for the promotion of internal improvements, and in 1841 the State found itself the victim of a wreck of nearly all the works to which it had contributed its financial credit. Notwithstanding the fact that it had received from the Federal Government its quota of the surplus revenue of the Treasury distributed among the States, amounting to nearly $1,000,000, yet it found itself, in 1841, unable to meet the interest due on its internal-improvement bonds. The debt for that purpose was in the neighborhood of $15,000,000. Every expedient had been resorted to short of taxation, and this or repudiation was the alternative now presented to its citizens. Repudiation was not to be thought of by that honest, God-fearing people, and they bowed their necks to the yoke and vowed that the State debt, principal and interest, should be paid to the last penny. They knew they were to be educated by a hard taskmaster—a great and unprofitable public debt. But they were reared in a school of the highest financial rectitude. Facing the disaster with manly fortitude, they turned to its payment with indomitable courage, and by the imposition of taxes on real estate, on judgment debts, on incomes, ground rents, collateral inheritances, commissions of executors and trustees, licenses and stamp taxes, and every other conceivable form of grinding taxation, the State resumed the payment of the interest on its public debt, and to-day it can pay every dollar of its outstanding obligations. This was the "emergency relief" to which "My Maryland" resorted in the dark hour of its financial adversity, and by which it earned for itself the name for financial honor, unsurpassed by any of its sister States.

The panic of 1857 was far more disastrous in its breadth than that of 1837. The whole fabric of social life was changed, and the reconstruction period lasted far beyond public expectation. But the masses of the people worked out their own financial salvation.

The panic of 1873 had its rise in the intoxicated condition of the money center of the country. For years before the extravagance and recklessness of the American people was simply colossal. Jim Fisk and his associates in Wall street were "plungers" who have had no parallel in financial history, ancient or modern, and the looting of the Erie Railroad was but the precursor of the reckless insurance spoliation by the men holding high rank in the financial world in these later days.

In that year of 1873 the Treasury Department reissued twenty-six million of the retired notes, without authority of law, which had been retired under the provisions of the act of 1865, that was enacted in the interest of the resumption of specie payments. In February, 1868, Congress repealed the act of 1865, $44,000,000 having been retired and were then in the Public Treasury. In October, 1873, Wall street became a pandemonium. Brokers like Henry Clews and others suspended payments; banks refused help in many quarters, and on one Sunday morning President Grant and the Secretary of the Treasury were almost mobbed by the madding crowd of stock gamblers and others at the Fifth Avenue Hotel. And then the most influential members of the Stock Exchange, headed by one of the ablest lawyers of that day, begged the President to loosen the purse strings of the Treasury and reissue the forty-four millions then retired and in the Treasury. The lawyer being asked by the President where was the legal authority to make such reissue was answered:

There was none, but it was an "emergency" in the financial world, and law should be ignored.

Then came Grant's memorable answer:

You can violate the law; the banks may violate the law, and will be sustained in doing so; but the President of the United States can not violate the law.

A cartoon by Thomas Nast in Harper's Weekly of the time pictorially illustrated that memorable scene. Subsequently to this noble stand of the President Congress, in 1874, passed a bill authorizing the reissue of the entire forty-four millions, but President Grant (brave soldier that he was) vetoed it, and it was not passed over his veto. Notwithstanding all this, the people of the United States soon rallied from their misfortune and began the sure work of again building up the fabric of prosperity.

Financial experts have found the causes of the panic of 1893 to have arisen in the apparent deficiency in the public revenue, threatening an inroad on the gold reserve for the ordinary expenditures of the Government, and in a more deep-seated fear of a distinct and disastrous change in the standard of value. Capital, ever quick to take alarm, began its withdrawal of money from daily circulation, and the process of hoarding was resorted to. That panic was the finest teacher of economy and living within one's means the country ever had, and the people, high and low, merchant and daily toiler, took in sail and became money savers for many years thereafter. Stringency in money matters is not comfortable, but it is a tutor that teaches.

The panic of 1907 is attributed to want of confidence in the community as to the trustworthiness of those who direct the affairs of the great corporations of the country. Many of them have been weighed in the balance and found wanting; they had used the moneys of widows and orphans to fill their own pockets with dishonest gains and to corrupt the suffrages of a free and liberty-loving people. Trust companies had failed; banks had gone to the wall; corporations had been formed to cover up shameful practices by directors and trustees; the criminal courts had been invoked to punish grand larceny and perjury and every criminal subterfuge, which the inventive genius of financial sharks had devised for personal profit, and of course credit failed, confidence was destroyed, money was, in self-defense, put in hiding, and financial disaster was the natural result. What but calamity could issue from this Pandora's box of iniquities? The country has borne the heat and burden of the day, the financial world has been winnowed of the chaff, and the wheat is being gathered in the barns. The fires of the furnaces are being lighted, the busy hum of the workshop once again gladdens our hearts, the channels of commerce are being filled with exchanges of merchandise, and the wonderful recuperative power of this people is being manifested on all sides. The emergency is passed; we want no schemes to inflate the currency and to call the gamblers from their dens to begin again their destructive work of wild-cat speculation. "Let us have peace"—after the turmoil and rancor of a Presidential contest shall have died away, let the wiseacres of the financial world put their heads together and devise a scheme of the whole banking and currency system which will provide a safe circulating medium for ordinary times and, as far as practicable, meet the exigencies of sudden commercial crises.

ADDITIONAL MEMBER OF THE PHILIPPINE COMMISSION

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if there is to be now no further debate on the financial bill, I should like to call up Senate bill 5507.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks for the present consideration of the bill referred to by him, the title of which will be stated.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask the Senator if there is any objection to its passage?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think so. It is a very short bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was my intention to call up the regular order; but as the Senator from Massachusetts desires to call up a measure that will not involve any debate, I shall not object.

Mr. LODGE. There is a unanimous report of the committee in favor of the bill for which I ask consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The title of the bill for which the Senator from Massachusetts asks consideration will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5507) to increase the membership of the Philippine Commission.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Philippines with an amendment, to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 2. That the President is hereby authorized in his discretion to create, by Executive order, and name a new executive department in the Philippine government, and to embrace therein such existing bureaus as he may designate in the order; and in his appointment of any Commission member he shall specify in his message to the Senate the department, if any, of which the appointee shall be the secretary.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the number of Commissioners constituting the Philippine Commission is hereby increased by one additional member, making the Commission consist of nine members; said additional member shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive the same salary and emoluments as are now or may hereafter be prescribed by law.

SEC. 2. That the President is hereby authorized in his discretion to create, by Executive order, and name a new executive department in the Philippine government, and to embrace therein such existing bureaus as he may designate in the order; and in his appointment of any Commission member he shall specify in his message to the Senate the department, if any, of which the appointee shall be the secretary.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will state the necessity for the passage of this bill. I understand, of course, that it comes from the Committee on the Philippines with a unanimous report; but while I am a member of the committee, I was not present when the bill was considered.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I can state the reasons for the passage of the bill in a very few words. I do not think there can be any objection to it.

The Philippine Commission constitutes the upper house of the assembly, which went into operation this year. It now consists of eight members. As members of the Commission are obliged to travel in different parts of the islands, it is extremely difficult to always maintain a quorum in Manila when the assembly is in session. A quorum of eight is five, and a quorum of nine is five; and this additional member will make it much easier to secure a quorum, which is very necessary.

Another reason is that the Commission is now greatly overworked and needs an additional member. For instance, the departments of finance and justice are combined in one Commissioner, and the work is more than any one Commissioner can properly manage. An additional member is therefore much needed.

I understand the intention also is to give the Filipinos a further representation on the Commission. Of course Senators are aware that the Commission is paid from the revenues of the island; that it makes no charge on the Treasury.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF STREET RAILWAY LINES TO UNION STATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 902) authorizing certain extensions to be made in the lines of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company, the Washington Railway and Electric Company, the City and Suburban Railway of Washington, and the Capital Traction Company, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment made by the House of Representatives, ask for a conference with the House on the bill and amendment, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice-President appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. LONG, and Mr. MARTIN.

REVISION OF THE PENAL LAWS.

Mr. HEYBURN. I call for the regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2982) to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. I have a very short bill here, consisting of less than a page, but I will not ask the Senator to yield provided the Senate will go on for a while on his bill. Every afternoon when we are at about this point we take up the Senator's bill and then adjourn.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will state in response to the Senator's suggestion that it is by taking up this bill every afternoon and making a little headway sometimes and much at other times that we have at last succeeded in passing upon all the provisions of the bill. We are now engaged in considering a section to which we recurred upon the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], and I do hope and believe that, with a few minutes of the time of the Senate this afternoon, we shall be able to dispose of the bill as in Committee of the Whole and have it printed, so that when it is taken up in the Senate it will be printed with all the changes that have been made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLAPP. It is perfectly agreeable to me to take up the bill provided we go on with it, but every afternoon when the Senate is about to get ready to pass bills, this bill is taken up, and then we adjourn.

Mr. HEYBURN. I hope the Senate will proceed with the bill.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I want to say to the Senator from Idaho that I understood from him that he would not ask to take up the bill this afternoon. I suppose there will be no trouble about taking it up to-morrow. There is nothing on the programme that I know of that would interfere. I did not expect that the bill would be taken up this afternoon, and I hope the Senator will not urge it. We are weary.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the fact that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] gave notice that he would address the Senate on the banking bill at 2 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, we were proceeding to consider section 20 of the bill when it was laid aside. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to some decisions that have been rendered by the courts in passing upon this section. I do this in support of the statement which I made upon the occasion of the last consideration of this section, that, while it might have been, and doubtless was, passed for a certain purpose—that is to say, Congress had in mind the accomplishment of a certain purpose—yet this provision has been found to be useful and necessary in enforcing the law in regard to other conditions than those before the minds of Congress at the time of the enactment of the bill. In the case of Davis v. The United States, in 107 Federal Reporter, at page 753, decided in 1901, it was found necessary to invoke the provisions of this section upon the trial of a party for the killing of revenue officers. The court, Judge Severens, stated in rendering the opinion in that case:

> These contentions—

That is, that the indictment charged in effect two separate offenses—

> These contentions are based upon a misconception of the effect of sections 5508 and 5509. They do not contemplate two distinct offenses against the United States. Only the conspiracy is of Federal cognizance, and it is that offense which is made punishable.

That is, the conspiracy—

> If, in the prosecution of it, a thing is done which is a crime by the laws of the State, the conspiracy is punishable by a measure of punishment equal to that prescribed by the law of the State for such other crime.

That goes only to the question of the measure of punishment—

> But it is an aggravation merely of the substantive offense of conspiracy. If the latter is not proven, there can be no conviction for the offense which constitutes the aggravating circumstance, and the proceeding falls to the ground. It is plainly indicated in Motes v. United States (178 U. S., 358) that this is the view taken of these sections by the Supreme Court. It can not be doubted that it was within the power of Congress to deal with such a conspiracy and impose such punishment therefor as it should deem proper, and, having such authority, it was competent to take notice of such incidents of violence and wrong as were likely to happen in the prosecution of such combinations, and to measure the punishment by that which is prescribed by the local law for such acts when made, of themselves, the subject of punishment. Though measured by those laws, the penalty is imposed by the law of the United States.

I think that goes very far toward meeting the objection urged by the Senator from Georgia that this section invested the United States court with jurisdiction over an offender for an offense against the State laws. Both the United States Supreme Court and the United States circuit court hold that the offense for which the party can be tried and punished in the United States court is limited to conspiracy, but if the parties are found guilty of the conspiracy they may be punished upon that verdict to the extent that they might be punished for the conspiracy and the crime committed pursuant of it combined. There is nothing unreasonable about that, because it must be that power will be vested somewhere for the punishment of a conspiracy that results in murder. That is one decision upon the question.

There are a great many of these cases coming before the courts even up to the present time—cases entirely different in character from those in contemplation at the time the statute was enacted. It has continually occurred in the jurisprudence of this country that a law enacted to meet an existing condition has been found useful and necessary to meet conditions not even contemplated at the time of the enactment of the law. Therefore, when the question of the continuance of this section in force is up for consideration we must consider not only whether the conditions that called for the enactment of the law exist, but whether other conditions exist that have arisen since. I desire to note in the RECORD in connection with this matter the case In re Lancaster (137 U. S., 393), Logan v. United States (144 U. S., 263), In re Quarles and Butler (158 U. S., 532), Motes v. United States (178 U. S., 458), and United States v. Davis (107 Fed. Rep., 753), all of which are recent cases.

I have here a list of cases that were tried under conditions that were not contemplated by the legislators at the time of the enactment of the law; but this law has proven to be useful and necessary to meet entirely new conditions of a different class from those then contemplated. Now to repeal it would leave no law upon the statute books under which these offenses of more recent origin and practice could be punished.

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he has read the cases the list of which he has cited to us?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; and I have a syllabus of them here.

Mr. BACON. I simply want to say, as to one of them, that I happen to know something about it. The case of In re Lancaster never was heard on the merits in any appellate court. It was before the Supreme Court once upon a very slight preliminary question before there was even an arraignment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would ask if the Senator refers to the Lancaster case?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. That was on a motion for leave to file a petition for a writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. BACON. That certainly can not be considered by the Senator in support of any argument he has made to-day, because that case never did get before any appellate court.

Mr. HEYBURN. The case grew out of an attempt to eject certain squatters on lands the title to which had been quieted in the Federal courts. The question first arose in 44 Federal Reporter, page 885. It goes to make up this statement as to the necessity or usefulness of this statute at this time. Of course the case in the 44 Federal Reporter is quite an ancient case. Then there is a case in 110 U. S., decided, of course, quite a long time ago, but I read it merely in stating the sequence of decisions. But when I call the attention of the Senator to cases as late as 158 and 178 United States Supreme Court Reports and 107 Federal Reporter, it will be evident that we are not compelled to rely upon the Lancaster case. It is only one case.

Mr. BACON. I thought if the Senator was referring——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I thought if the Senator was referring to the Lancaster case as an authority, and he had no other cases which were any more authority than the Lancaster case, that his brief was not very valuable, because I happen to know something about the Lancaster case. It never was before an appellate court upon any question which involved the merits of the case.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think the Senator will find, when the record of what I said is printed, that I called the attention of the Senate to these cases in order that they might have, should they desire to review what I had said on this question, a statement of cases in which this section had been considered and adjudicated. I do not attempt in thus stating it to go into the merits of each case. I have before me, as I have said, a statement which I have made up from an inspection of these cases. I am prepared to go into each one of them should it be deemed necessary or profitable to do so; but I think, in discussing the question with the Senator from Georgia, it will not be necessary to go further than to show that the courts find this section of the criminal law of the United States useful and necessary in order to punish other offenses than those in contemplation at the time of the enactment of the section. That being shown, it seems to me that it would appeal to the legal mind that we ought not to repeal a statute merely because the conditions that called for or resulted in its enactment had passed away, if it is shown that other conditions require the presence of such a law upon the statute books.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not know whether it is very profitable for us to discuss this question, because, as the Senator well knows, if we come to a final issue there is no way by which it can be determined. It may very seriously affect the question as to whether or not the bill will ultimately pass; but I do not know that we can determine the question as to whether or not the Senator shall prevail in his contention or whether I shall prevail in mine, because the necessary machinery for that determination is not at hand; but I want to say, in order that the RECORD may be complete, that the Senator misapprehends altogether the point of my objection to the section.

This is not a section which I claim was adapted or designed for a condition of affairs different from that which now exists. I say it is a section which was never a proper section upon the books, and that it is simply a cloak, a device, under which offenses purely against the State law are taken cognizance of by the Federal courts, and under which parties are tried and convicted in the Federal courts when the offense committed is an offense simply against the State. I am going to state this very briefly, because I do not feel any disposition to go into any long argument this afternoon. I did not expect this matter to come up at this time, and I was quite content with the suggestion the Senator himself had made to me that the resumption of the consideration of this bill should not be had until to-morrow. But in order that my point may be made clear, I will read the section preceding this section and then that section in connection with it, to show how utterly useless it is for the purpose of affecting the punishment of anyone who violates the Federal law and how adapted it is to the usurpation of jurisdiction by the Federal courts of an offense against the State which is not an offense against the Federal authority.

Section 5508 is the one in which there is an offense against the Federal Government set out, and it is in these words:

If two or more persons conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having so exercised the same; or if two or more persons go in disguise on the highway, or on the premises of another, with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege so secured—

There is the offense set out, complete in itself. Here comes the penalty:

They shall be fined not more than $5,000 and imprisoned not more than ten years; and shall, moreover, be thereafter ineligible to any office, or place of honor, profit, or trust created by the Constitution or laws of the United States.

I think anyone will agree, whether he be lawyer or layman, that the offense is set out there and the penalty is attached, making in itself a complete statute, and nothing more is needed to punish for the offense committed against the Federal authority. If there were no other section there would be no trouble in the administration of the law. If nothing followed it nothing more would be required. A party who violated the terms of the statute, as I have read it, could be indicted and tried, and if found guilty could be punished, and no slight punishment either. It will be noted that the offense is the conspiring for the purpose of preventing anyone from exercising, or intimidating anyone in the attempt to exercise, his rights under the Constitution and laws of the United States, or because of having so exercised those rights, or conspiring to prevent his enjoyment of right or privilege under the laws or the Constitution of the United States. If he does either of those things, which is the extent of the statute, he can be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 and imprisonment for not more than ten years, and in addition to that he is thereafter ineligible to any office or place of honor, trust, or profit created by the Constitution or laws of the United States. That is complete in itself. The offense is complete and the penalty no one will say is inadequate.

Now, what is the next section? Mr. President, bear in mind my criticism is that the next section is an entirely independent section, in nowise necessary to support the first section, and that it relates entirely to an offense committed against the State and not to an offense committed against the United States. I will read it and see:

If in the act of violating any provision in either of the two preceding sections—

I did not read the first of the two preceding sections, but it is of the same nature, with an offense set out and a penalty attached, complete in itself. Here is this independent section 5509 to which I am objecting:

If in the act of violating any provision in either of the two preceding sections any other felony—

Not anything that is a part of that felony, but "any other felony"— or misdemeanor be committed, the offender shall be punished for the same with such punishment as is attached to such felony or misdemeanor by the laws of the State in which the offense is committed.

How possibly can it be contended that that section relates to anything except some felony perpetrated in the State, not a part of the original felony? It might have been done in connection with, but it has no office as a part of the original offense.

The law is not ambiguous. It does not leave us in doubt as to whether or not it is an offense which may be properly said to constitute a part of either of the offenses specified in either of the two preceding sections. It says specifically "any other," not a part of the same, but any other offense. Here are offenses set out against the Government of the United States, and they are complete in themselves. If at any time another felony is committed, can it be a part of the offense against the United States? The felony specified in each of the two sections is complete in itself and not left in doubt as to what it is, and the section then makes provision for a case where, when they are doing that, they commit some other felony. Of course it can only be a felony against the State. If the section had gone on to say if they commit some other felony they should be punished by imprisonment for a certain specified term of years or by the payment of a certain specified fine, there might be some contention. But the section not only specifies a felony which can be none other than a felony against the State, but absolutely goes forward and specifies the same penalty as that prescribed by the State, the plain purpose being to invest the Federal court, after it has once taken jurisdiction of an offense against the United States Government, with the further jurisdiction to take cognizance of an offense against the State and to punish with the penalty of the State. In other words, it constitutes the Federal court the court in which an offender against the State law can be tried for the offense against the State law and punished for the offense against the State law with the penalty prescribed by the State law. How is there any possible escape from such a conclusion?

Mr. President, what is the evil of this thing? The evil of it is that parties who commit offenses against the State are, after the offense has been committed, as an afterthought by some one who wishes to drag them before the United States court, charged with a conspiracy, one of those intangible offenses where somebody can testify to something that he heard somebody else say, and if the necessity is put upon one it is one of the most difficult things in the world to prove that a man did not say something, with a design to carry a case into the Federal court. After there has been an assault, possibly, a difficulty between two people, one of whom wants to have a trial in the Federal court, he goes and makes any sort of an allegation about a conspiracy, an afterthought, and a man is dragged a hundred miles from his home, away from his witnesses, put to great expense and inconvenience, and in a position where it is almost impossible for him properly to defend himself, and carried before a Federal court and tried for an offense which can only properly be tried in a State court.

It is not a slight matter, Mr. President, and I was not speaking lightly when I said in opening my remarks that we might not be able this afternoon, for the lack of proper machinery here, to determine whether this section shall go out or whether it shall remain in the bill. It is a matter of such grave importance that it is one which may put in jeopardy the whole question whether this bill shall receive the sanction of the Senate. I regard it as one of the most important things in this body of laws. I say one of the most important—one of the gravest and most serious, one absolutely unnecessary to the proper administration of the Federal law, and one of the most serious, which is found in practical operation to give opportunity to usurpation by the Federal courts of jurisdiction in the trial of cases where the offense has been committed against the State and not against the General Government.

Mr. President, I have no desire to delay the Senate with a further argument. I think I have presented it in a way that Senators present can understand the enormity of this thing, and I want to say to the Senator from Idaho that the thing which has impressed this case upon me more seriously than anything else is the very case of Lancaster from which he read. I was of counsel in that case, and I know all about it. It was a plain case of murder. The question who committed the murder was a very serious question in the case. But whoever committed it, it was a plain case of murder, and a very atrocious case of murder. Parties were dragged a hundred miles from their homes, tried away from their families and their friends, where it was difficult for them to procure witnesses, and where, before any witness could be summoned before the court, there had to be reduced to writing a statement of everything it was expected to be proved by that witness, which had to be handed to the prosecuting attorney for him to be ready with a witness to rebut the evidence before it was brought into court. After a trial which lasted for more than thirty days some of the parties were sent to the penitentiary for life and others for terms of years, and after some of them had died in prison and but one remained, President McKinley pardoned that man Lancaster upon the statement of Attorney-General Griggs in writing that upon the record in that case he ought never to have been convicted. The Senator wants illustrations. There is a concrete case which he himself has brought before the Senate; and it is not the only instance in which I have had a practical illustration of the enormity of this law.

Mr. President, if there is anything that is important under our system of Government, it is that parties should be tried in their States for offenses against the State, and that by no warping or twisting, with the General Government organized as it was for altogether other purposes, should plain offenses against the State be taken jurisdiction of by the Federal courts. The Federal courts sit at long distances from one another. It is the right of the party to be tried, except in very extraordinary circumstances, by a jury of the vicinage, and he should be tried near the scene of the alleged crime, where he can have the attendance of his witnesses, and it is a hardship and an enormity and an iniquity that a statute so absolutely unnecessary for the maintenance of any Federal interest as this is should remain upon the statute book by which men can be dragged a hundred miles from their homes to be tried for an ordinary case of violation of the State law.

Mr. President, I move to strike out the section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 20, on page 12.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, because there has been a miscarriage of justice in the enforcement of a law is not conclusive proof that the law is bad. Without undertaking to review the proceedings in the Lancaster case or to consider the question whether or not in that particular case the parties should have been held under the provisions of this law, it certainly is proper, when we are considering the question of a law so wide in its scope and so necessary in its purpose and effect to maintain rights of individuals under the law made by this body, to overlook the question whether or not in some instances the law has been so administered as to work a hardship.

Mr. President, I will leave the Lancaster case twenty years behind. I guess twenty years is about the period which has elapsed since that case first came before the courts in 34 Federal Reporter.

Mr. BACON. Not quite.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Georgia will know better than I as to whether or not that period is too long.

Mr. BACON. It is a little too long.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was before the United States Supreme Court in the one hundred and thirty-seventh volume of the reports of that court, and we are now beyond the two hundredth volume.

Mr. BACON. Long enough for a man to stay in the penitentiary ten years, when the Attorney-General himself, after an examination of the record, said he ought never to have gone there at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. There are, unfortunately, in the history of jurisprudence in this country a number of cases where parties have been punished unjustly and where it required many years to develop that fact, but it would not do to repeal the statute under which they were tried and convicted because, forsooth, they were unfortunate in that regard. I do not believe that any lawyer in this body would hold that a sufficient reason for repealing the law.

In the case of Logan v. The United States, which was some years after the Lancaster case, Logan and others were indicted under sections 5508 and 5509. Section 5509 is section 20 of this bill, to which the motion to strike out, made by the Senator from Georgia, is directed. Logan was indicted for conspiracy and for murder committed in pursuance of a conspiracy. Section 5508 does not provide a punishment for the violation of any law of the State. It provides a punishment for a violation of the rights of the citizen secured to him by the Constitution or the laws of the United States, or because of his having so exercised his rights thereunder.

It is a rule of universal application that a violation of the laws of the United States is punishable always, presumably, in the courts of the United States, and the section 5508 is directed only to the violation of the laws of the United States. Section 5509 merely provides a rule for punishment for those who are convicted under 5508; nothing more. Section 20, to which the Senator's motion is directed, does not in itself prescribe a crime. It provides a rule for the punishment of the crime that is prescribed in the preceding section. That is all.

Now, I think that in itself might rest as a complete answer to the argument of the Senator from Georgia against the provisions of section 20, because I repeat it does not provide any additional crime to that which is provided for in section 19 of the bill under consideration. Section 19 of the bill, I take it, would not be attacked on the ground stated by the Senator from Georgia, because it in terms confines its application to a violation of the laws of the United States, and you could not punish a person under the provisions of section 19 for the violation of the law of the State, because the statute leaves no margin for such a construction, and the murder that is committed in the process of violating the provisions of section 19 is merely made the basis, not of a trial, not of an indictment, but the basis of determining the measure of the punishment. That is all; nothing more.

Mr. President, to consider the Logan case a little further, certain persons were in the custody of a deputy United States marshal, under an indictment charging them with larceny. While so in custody Logan and others, in pursuance of a conspiracy, in the nighttime went upon the highway in disguise, waylaid the deputy and his prisoners, and shot and killed one of the prisoners. Logan and others were found guilty of conspiracy. Conspiracy to do what? Conspiracy to take these prisoners from a United States marshal. They were in the custody of a United States marshal by virtue of his authority under section 19. They were in custody for the violation of the provisions of section 19 of this bill as it was written at that time in the Revised Statutes. They went upon the highway masked, at nighttime, and, pursuant to the conspiracy that they had entered into, which was not to kill anybody, not to commit murder, which would be a crime under the laws of the State, but a conspiracy to release prisoners from the custody of the United States marshal. But in the carrying into effect of that conspiracy they killed the prisoner. The court in sentencing them took into consideration the fact that they had killed the prisoner for the purpose of determining the measure of punishment under the provisions of section 20, now under consideration. That is the Logan case.

Would it appeal to the Senator from Georgia that a punishment merely for rescuing the prisoner, where murder had been committed, would have been a sufficient punishment? Ought not the conspiracy that resulted in the commission of this murder be taken into consideration by the court in punishing the parties? Should there be two trials—one in the United States court for a part of a crime, and another in the State court for another part of the same crime, they all being the same act, growing out of the same intent or the same conspiracy? Should there be two trials? Would there be anything gained to the administration of the law of the land by dividing it? Then, which court should have jurisdiction? The crime was originally initiated in violation of the laws of the United States which are peculiarly within the consideration of the courts of the United States. The indictment was found in the courts of the United States. Should they have disregarded the fact that this party, whose only crime originally under the laws of the United States was the entering into a conspiracy to liberate a prisoner, had committed a graver offense pursuant to the same conspiracy.

Now, that is as far as the court went, and the United States Supreme Court held that, having entered into a conspiracy to do an unlawful act under the laws of the United States, they might be held responsible to the full extent for the act which they committed. Many murders are committed in the carrying out of a conspiracy that were not contemplated when the conspiracy was entered into. The law can not disregard these graver acts because they were not within the contemplation of the conspirators at the time of the conspiracy or when it was formed. But the conspiracy is against the laws of the United States. I desire that to be emphasized and that language to be incorporated into my statement. I read the section to which the offense is initiative, section 5508:

If two or more persons conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having so exercised the same; or if two or more persons go in disguise on the highway, or on the premises of another, with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege so secured—

That is, secured to him under the Constitution or laws of the United States. How would the courts of a State have jurisdiction of such an offense? The courts of the State may punish only for a violation of the laws of the State. The courts of the United States punish only for a violation of the laws of the United States.

Will it be maintained that the parties should go free because they did not succeed in committing an offense that the laws of the State might take notice of? May they not be punished for conspiring together for the purpose of defeating the rights of a party under the Constitution or the laws, which are equally sacred, enacted by Congress? The United States Supreme Court, in the Logan case, recited this fact:

Logan and others were found guilty of the conspiracy.

That is what they were found guilty of. They were not found guilty of the murder; they were found guilty of the conspiracy; and as a part of the proof establishing their guilt of the conspiracy were the facts of the murder. The court did not undertake to try the party for murder, but did try the party for the conspiracy, and took into consideration all of the facts which surrounded the conspiracy in determining the punishment that was appropriate under the act of Congress.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon a question?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. Under any state of facts that would warrant the court in punishing a party in a proceeding for conspiracy, taking into account in imposing that penalty the fact of the homicide, would there not have been sufficient facts established to have prosecuted for the homicide under the State law?

Mr. HEYBURN. There would have been sufficient facts, but the United States court having already taken jurisdiction of what you might call the primary offense out of which the graver offense grew, as I have before suggested, it would seem to be neither in keeping with the ordinary methods of administering the law, nor would it be required under the statute that the United States should release its hold upon the prisoner for the punishment of the offense against its laws because, forsooth, the party had been guilty of an offense against the laws of the State. Had the State taken possession of the defendant for the crime of murder, it having first acquired jurisdiction, it might take into consideration, if it were necessary, but it would not generally be necessary, the question of the conspiracy out of which the murder grew.

Mr. CLAPP. If I may be permitted to offer a suggestion, it appears to me that while the conspiracy may have been primary in point of time the graver offense was the homicide, and, waiving any question which the court could try, the homicide should be tried and punished in the trial of the homicide, instead of taking the homicide into account in a general indefinite way in imposing a penalty for conspiracy in a Federal court.

Mr. HEYBURN. That goes to the question of the wisdom of the lawmakers who enacted this law.

Mr. CLAPP. That is what we are discussing now, and that was in view in reserving this provision.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am admonished that it is getting late, so I will not elaborate unnecessarily. It will be profitable to consider some of the other cases that have carried forward this doctrine. In the case of Quarles and Butler, which was a more recent case, the petitioners were indicted under these two sections for having, in pursuance of a conspiracy, gone in the nighttime to the house of a person who had informed a deputy United States marshal that certain persons were engaged in the illicit distilling of liquors and beaten and illtreated him and shot at him with intent to kill him because of his having given such information. A writ of habeas corpus was denied by the United States Supreme Court in this case, the court holding that such acts came within the inhibition of the statutes.

That, of course, is a clear adjudication of the principle involved in these two sections. There they shot and wounded and beat this man in carrying into effect a conspiracy that they had entered into in violation of the laws of the United States regulating the distilling of liquor. They assaulted a person who gave information to one of the officers of the United States. That is a clear determination of the legal question as to the manner of proceeding and the extent and purpose of this law.

I call attention to the Motes case. It is in 178 United States, at page 568. That case is entitled "Motes v. The United States." Motes and others entered into a conspiracy to injure and oppress one Thompson for having given information to a United States commissioner that certain persons were engaged in the unlawful distilling of liquor. In furtherance of the conspiracy they shot and killed Thompson. For this they were indicted under sections 5508 and 5509, tried, and convicted. The court sustained the conviction of Motes, but reversed the judgments against the other conspirators for errors upon the trial and remanded the cases for new trial. They, however, held that the conviction of Motes would not be disturbed, because he committed this murder in the execution of a conspiracy against the laws of the United States.

In United States v. Davis the circuit court of appeals for the sixth circuit points out that in the prosecutions under sections 5508 and 5509 it is the conspiracy that is punished, and that if any other offense be committed in carrying out the conspiracy such other offense is not punished, but the commission of such other offense aggravates or increases the punishment which may be imposed for the conspiracy. Upon this point, respecting the claim made that there were two distinct offenses in the same case, the court says what I have already read from the decision of Judge Severens in that case. He simply elaborates the idea that the party is not convicted for the murder or for the assault; he is convicted for the conspiracy; but the punishment for conspiracy under that section is graduated according to the result of the execution of the conspiracy. If the conspiracy resulted in no great harm to any individual, the punishment would doubtless be commensurate with the offense. If the conspiracy resulted in the destruction of property or life or a serious assault, the court is authorized by section 20 to take that into consideration in fixing the punishment, not for the murder, not for the burning, not for the assault, but in considering the punishment for the conspiracy.

Does it not appeal to the legal mind that the court should be authorized by law to take into consideration in determining the punishment the gravity of the offense that is committed pursuant to the carrying out of the conspiracy? Because it may have worked a hardship in one or in many cases the wisdom of the law can not be attacked on that point.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. PILES. Although on the committee, I was not present, as I now recall, when this section was considered by the committee. I should like to ask the Senator if all the cases he has been citing were not prosecutions under section 19?

Mr. HEYBURN. No, Mr. President; every one of them recited both sections. I have only selected those cases where the carrying out of the conspiracy involved the commission of the larger offenses. There are a line of cases in which that element does not occur, but I have only brought here for consideration those particular cases in which both sections 19 and 20 are mentioned and both considered by the court.

Mr. PILES. I do not think the Senator catches my point. My question is this: Has there been any man prosecuted according to the decisions which the Senator has cited here under section 20 for an offense named in section 20; that is to say, if in the act violating any provisions of the preceding section any other felony or misdemeanor has been committed? For instance, will the Senator contend if a murder had been committed in execution of the conspiracy that it could be prosecuted in the courts of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Not at all as murder; no.

Mr. PILES. Then what is the necessity for section 20?

Mr. HEYBURN. In order to give the court a scope in administering the punishment that is commensurate with the offense or, rather, with the result of the conspiracy. That was the purpose of enacting section 20, which——

Mr. PILES. Is there any necessity for the court having such evidence before it in order to fix the punishment under section 19?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; because under section 19 the maximum punishment is a fine of not more than $5,000 and imprisonment for not more than ten years. It will not be maintained for a moment that that would be an adequate punishment for parties guilty of conspiracy which resulted in the more serious consequences that have been shown to have existed in the cases which I have cited.

Mr. PILES. Is not the court bound to know, in trying a conspiracy case, that murder was committed? Will not the court know that fact? Is not that fact bound to be developed in the trial of the conspiracy case, and can not the court therefore determine the punishment just as well without section 20 as with it?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; it would be limited to the number of years and the amount of fine prescribed in section 19, and there is a limit there that is not commensurate with so grave an offense as that which was under consideration in the cases that have been cited.

Mr. PILES. I confess I am unable, sir, to see the necessity of section 20. I do not think that in the cases the Senator has cited there is any necessity for the existence of that section. If that section had been considered in my presence in the committee I should have voted against it.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was probably considered when the Senator was not present. Every section in this bill received the most careful consideration at the hands of the committee. Nothing was taken for granted. Every line and letter of every section of the bill was considered at length, and upon some single sections the committee spent several days and reviewed every decision that had ever been rendered by any court affecting the operation of those sections. So it may be safely said that there is nothing in the bill as the result of inadvertence on the part of the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think we can get ready in a minute to print the bill, and I think all Senators will agree with me that it is desirable to do so.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I wish to make one remark before the measure is put to a vote as in Committee of the Whole. There are a good many things in this body of criminal law to which I have very serious objection. I do not think it is practicable to get them out. I make this statement because I do not wish to be considered in voting for the passage of the bill, which I expect to do, that I give my assent to those objectionable features. If there was any possibility of getting them out, of course, I would avail myself of it, but I think there is none. I feel it due to myself to make this statement. I think, however, I should have voted against the bill if section 20 had been retained.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is my intention at an early day to ask that a time be fixed by unanimous consent to vote upon the bill after it is considered in the Senate. I should like to get it out of Committee of the Whole and have it reprinted, so that in the Senate we may consider the bill in better form than it can possibly be considered as in Committee of the Whole, with the amendments that have been made.

Mr. MCLAURIN. There is one little amendment that I believe the committee agrees is a proper amendment. In section 95, after the words "sufficient evidence," in line 19, I move to add the words "prima facie."

Mr. HEYBURN. I have no objection to that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 48, line 19, following the word "evidence," insert the words "prima facie."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. There are some amendments I have to offer to which I think no one will object. The Post-Office Department has found that the inventive genius of a certain class of people has encompassed the present law to such an extent that it is necessary to insert certain words in section 212, which pertains to contraband publications in the mail.

On page 109, line 18, after the word "lascivious," I move to insert "or vile, or filthy, or disgusting." The courts have held that certain matters do not come within the meaning of "lascivious."

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I do not think we ought to go so far as to include the word "disgusting." That is a matter about which there might be some latitude or difference of opinion. As to the other two, I think everybody will agree that what is vile and filthy ought not to go through the mail. I hardly think the other ought to be included. To disgust a man is not necessarily a serious offense.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me, it is rather a difficult question to consider anywhere, but if he or any other Senator will go down to the room of the Joint Committee on the Revision of the Laws he will see there ample reason for the insertion of this one particular word "disgusting." The courts have interpreted the other words, the words "lascivious" and "vile," and "filthy," and yet in one place in Chicago we captured several tons of postal cards and mail matter that did not come within the definitions of lascivious or vile or filthy, but they are of such a character as would leave no occasion for any argument if they could be inspected for a moment. They may be seen. They were sent over from the Post-Office Department in support of their request that these words be inserted in the bill. While I was not in favor of enlarging this or any other statute without a reason, upon seeing the class of matter which was captured recently I withdraw any possible objection to it.

Mr. BAILEY. The trouble about it is that you could easily imagine something that would not be as extreme as the exhibits which have convinced the judgment of the Senator from Idaho, and there might be a very reasonable difference of opinion. It might disgust one man of a very sensitive nature and a more robust nature might not be very seriously offended. The man who sent it might be one of the robust kind, who was not disgusted so easily, and thus commit a crime without any thought of doing it.

I think we have gone far enough with the postal authorities in yielding to them at their solicitations and increasing their power. I certainly have no disposition to permit the improper use of the mails. I think the Government ought to severely punish a man who uses one of its instrumentalities for an improper purpose. Yet it seems to me that when we get to the point that we punish American citizens because they might disgust somebody, we have gone beyond wholesome lawmaking and we have engaged in a kind of a dilettanteism that is not in harmony with our best traditions. I hope the Senator from Idaho will agree to omit that word.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say candidly these words were sent by the Post-Office Department, and our attention has been called to the decisions defining the meaning of the other words. Personally, I did not have it called to my attention until it was called to the attention of the committee for the purpose of making the law so secure against the transmission of this class of matter that there could be no doubt about it.

Mr. BAILEY. Does this section merely exclude it from the mail or does it make it a crime for a man to put such matter in the mail?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I will state that it makes it a penal offense for any person knowingly to deposit any of these things in the mail.

Mr. HEYBURN. The language, if amended as I propose, will read this way:

Every obscene, lewd, or lascivious, or vile, or filthy, or disgusting book, pamphlet, picture, paper, letter, writing, print, or other publication of an indecent character, and every article—

Enumerating them, are excluded from the mail, and—

Whoever shall knowingly deposit, or cause to be deposited, for mailing or delivery—

Then insert the words "any," etc.—

declared by this section to be nonmailable, or shall knowingly take, or cause the same to be taken, from the mails for the purpose of circulating or disposing thereof, etc.

That is the character of the provision.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I am clear that that is going altogether too far. It is perfectly proper for the Government to make it a crime for a man to use its mails for the transmission of vile, lascivious, or obscene literature, but when you come to the point that is disgusting I think that is going too far. I have seen some publications that did not have a strain of immorality in them that were disgusting to me. Occasionally I see a man attempt to make a speech which exhibits all through it that he did not know what he was talking about. That disgusts me. I suppose if the Senator from Idaho were administering the law he would not consider that kind of a document within the prohibition of the law, but it only illustrates the great latitude which we are conferring upon the court.

Then I resent the idea that we have reached a point where we have to make it a crime in this country for one man to disgust another in any way. That is a kind of personal privilege that everybody ought to enjoy. I do not think it is a matter calling for a penalty and to be declared as a crime. Of course I am not going to interfere any further than to vote against it. I would vote against the whole amendment with that word in it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I agree with what the Senator from Texas has said about this matter. I think the statute goes quite far enough as it is. I am not only opposed to putting the word "disgusting" in the statute, but the word "vile." There are three words the Senator mentioned.

Mr. BAILEY. "Vile" and "filthy."

Mr. HEYBURN. "Vile" or "filthy" or "disgusting."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am opposed to putting in the words "vile" or "filthy" or "disgusting." The statute as it reads is that every obscene, lewd, or lascivious book, pamphlet, picture, and so forth, is to be excluded from the mails. If we add to that the term "disgusting," perhaps it would include books which ought to be sent through the mails—for instance, medical books. They would be disgusting to some people and yet be perfectly legitimate publications. It would exclude books that ought not to be forbidden the mails. Articles in newspapers—editorials—may be disgusting, and they may sometimes be vile in the estimation of a good many people, yet I think we would be going altogether too far to forbid those things from going through the mail.

Mr. HEYBURN. I merely ask that the question be submitted to a vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CLAPP. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "disgusting." Then, I think, we could probably vote for the amendment as amended.

Mr. HEYBURN. Very well; I am glad to have that question presented.

Mr. BACON. I suggest to omit the words designated by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], which I think are equally objectionable.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is all there is of the amendment.

Mr. BACON. Of course.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Utah has objected to the three words "vile" or "filthy" or "disgusting."

Mr. BACON. I think the law as it stands is adequate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Very well; let us take a vote on it.

Mr. BACON. I will say nothing further if the Senator from Idaho who makes the suggestion does not press it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] as amended.

The amendment as amended was rejected.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President, that is a fair expression, and I will not offer the other amendments, which were for the same purposes in other parts of the section. The amendment that I have offered has been at the request of the Post-Office Department, as I have already explained.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. HEYBURN. I now ask that the bill be printed as reported to the Senate from the Committee of the Whole.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. All in roman type?

Mr. HEYBURN. No. I probably should have been more explicit in my statement. I ask that the bill be printed as reported to the Senate, the amendments to be in italics and the brackets to be omitted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the bill as reported to the Senate be printed with the amendments in italics and the brackets omitted. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MILLE LAC BAND OF CHIPPEWA INDIANS.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5330) for the relief of the Mille Lac band of Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to give to the Court of Claims jurisdiction to hear and determine a suit or suits to be brought by and on behalf of the Mille Lac band of Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota against the United States on account of losses sustained by them or the Chippewas of Minnesota by reason of the opening of the Mille Lac Reservation in the State of Minnesota, embracing about 61,000 acres of land, to public settlement under the general land laws of the United States; provides that from any final judgment or decree of the Court of Claims either party shall have the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the cause shall be advanced on the docket of the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court of the United States if the same shall be appealed; and upon the final determination of such suit or suits the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to decree the fees to be paid to the attorney or attorneys employed by the Mille Lac band of Indians, and the same shall be paid out of any sum or sums found due that band or to the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time and passed.

RECIPROCAL PRIVILEGES TO FOREIGN YACHTS.

Mr. PILES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5333) relating to yachts. The bill has been heretofore read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him, which has been heretofore read. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that whenever it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the President of the United States that yachts belonging to any regularly organized yacht club of the United States are allowed to arrive at and depart from any foreign port and to cruise in the waters of such port without entering or clearing at the custom-house thereof and without the payment of any charges for entering or clearing, dues, duty per ton, tonnage taxes or charges for cruising licenses, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may authorize and direct the customs authorities at the various ports and subports of entry of the United States to allow yachts from such foreign port belonging to any regularly organized yacht club thereof to arrive at and depart from any port or subport of the United States and to cruise in waters of the United States without the payment of any charges for entering or clearing, dues, duty per ton, or tonnage taxes, but the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may, in his discretion, direct that such foreign yachts shall be required to obtain licenses to cruise, in a form prescribed by him, before they shall be allowed under the provisions of this act to cruise in waters of the United States. Such licenses shall be issued without cost to such yachts and shall prescribe such limitations as to length of time, direction, and place of cruising and action, and such other particulars as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may deem proper.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 25, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 24, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

UNITED STATES COURTS AT DOTHAN, ALA.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17524) to provide for circuit and district courts of the United States at Dothan, Ala., which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say this: There have been two bills passed through this Congress increasing the number of places in which to hold court. The first was in the State of Texas, presented by a gentleman from that side of the Chamber. Although I was somewhat doubtful about it, I did not object at that time.

The next one came from the State of Kentucky, and was presented by a gentleman on this side of the House. I then stated I would not object to that, because the other had been allowed, but I did give notice that I should object to these bills hereafter until I had an opportunity to examine them to see whether there was any necessity. After I made that statement I received a letter from one of the judges of one of the Southern States, in which he took notice of what I had said in the House and protested most vigorously against the establishment of so many courts and divisions where there was so little business. Now, Mr. Speaker, in view of that, for the present I shall object to the consideration of this bill, which, I understand, establishes places for holding court.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I could explain the matter to the gentleman now perhaps——

Mr. PAYNE. It is hardly worth while taking the time of the House. I will be very glad to talk with the gentleman in regard to it at his convenience.

Mr. CLAYTON. It is hard to draw the line on me; I should prefer he should draw the line on somebody else. He stood in his place and has not objected to others, and here is a bill to which there is no objection from any quarter except the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, the gentleman from New York has the right to be the only Member of the House to object to any bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. I understand, but he has not objected to bills of this kind before.

Mr. PAYNE. I thought I explained it to the gentleman when I said the first bill coming in was from the State of Texas, and while I had my doubts about it I refrained from objecting. The next came from the State of Kentucky, presenting a better case and offered by a gentleman on this side of the House. I announced then I should object to the consideration of any more of these bills in the House until I had had an opportunity to examine each individual bill. Mr. Speaker, I therefore object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the bill S. 3409, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. This bill, Mr. Speaker, is identical with the House bill which heretofore was erroneously referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and thereafter by unanimous consent referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. Now, a Senate bill identical comes over and by a like error is again referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. What is the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a bill to extend the time for the payment of settlers in the Kiowa Reservation.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3409) to extend the time of payments on certain homestead entries in Oklahoma.

The SPEAKER. And the request is for a change of reference from the Committee on the Public Lands to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object; this is land in Oklahoma, is it?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; it is a part of an Indian reservation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. An Indian reservation in Oklahoma?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, the request is proper.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I think there is some question whether this bill belongs to the Committee on Indian Affairs. These lands when they were opened to settlement became public lands, and under the rule I think the bill was properly in the first instance sent to the Committee on the Public Lands. The Committee on the Public Lands very carefully examined the matter and later, I understand, though I had no knowledge of that fact until this morning, the House bill was rereferred, I am told, to the Committee on Indian Affairs. The Senate bill was likewise referred to the Committee on the Public Lands when it came to the House very properly. I think, Mr. Speaker, that was the proper reference. I still believe this bill belongs under the rules to the Committee on the Public Lands, but personally I have no desire to interpose an objection in view of the fact that the gentlemen interested in the legislation are favorable to this re-reference. Therefore, I withhold that objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and the re-reference is made.

IMMIGRATION COMMISSION INVESTIGATION.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolutions of the House numbered 115 and 209, have had the same under consideration and report herewith a resolution in lieu thereof, with the recommendation that the House agree to the same:

Resolved, That the Immigration Commission be requested to make an investigation into the treatment and conditions of work of immigrants on the cotton plantations of the Mississippi Delta, in the States of Mississippi and Arkansas, and upon the turpentine farms, lumber camps, and railway camps in the States of Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, and other Southern States; and to report thereon at as early a date as possible.

Mr. DALZELL. On that I ask the previous question.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order. That is not a privileged report.

Mr. DALZELL. It is from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MANN. That may all be. It may come from the Committee on Rules, but the Committee on Rules can not make everything a privileged report.

Mr. DALZELL. All reports from the Committee on Rules are privileged.

Mr. MANN. They are not unless they have jurisdiction of the subject-matter. This resolution has nothing to do with the organization of the House, but directs an outside Commission to make an investigation. I want to say——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] to the rules.

The following-named committees shall have leave to report at any time on the matters herein stated, viz: The Committee on Rules, on rules, joint rules, and order of business.

That seems to cover the limits of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will ask unanimous consent.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the question as to whether this is a privileged report or not under the rules.

Mr. DALZELL. I understand that all reports are privileged when they come from a committee that is entitled to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again call the attention of the gentleman to the rules. The Chair was under the same impression as that expressed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania until his attention was called to the rule. The Clerk will read Rule LXI, on page 273 of the Manual.

The Clerk read as follows:

The following-named committees shall have leave to report at any time on the matters herein stated, viz: The Committee on Rules, on rules, joint rules, and order of business; the Committee on Elections, on the right of a Member to his seat, etc.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I call attention, however, to the next paragraph of the rule, which says:

It shall always be in order to call up for consideration a report from the Committee on Rules, and, pending the consideration thereof, the Speaker may entertain one motion, that the House adjourn.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the gentleman has not got his report into the House yet.

Mr. SHERMAN. Just reporting it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has no right to present his report in this way unless it is privileged. If it is not before the House, he can not call it up.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman has presented the report of the Committee on Rules, and the question is now whether it is privileged, and therefore entitled to consideration.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman can not present any report except a privileged report in this way. He must present his report by dropping it in the basket, like any other committee would do.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman is begging the question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Rules has no jurisdiction of these resolutions. The rules provide that there shall be referred to the Committee on Rules all proposed actions touching the rules, joint rules, and order of business. Anything else that is referred to the Committee on Rules is not properly referred to that committee, and is certainly not referred under the rules, and certainly can not be privileged matter. Now, giving to the Committee on Rules only jurisdiction over the rules, the rules then provide the report from that committee shall be privileged; but here is a resolution to give to an outside Commission, entirely foreign to the House—created by an act of Congress and not by the House—jurisdiction over matters that the House has nothing to do with. There might as well have come from the Committee on Rules a resolution directing the Secretary of War to make certain investigations or creating an outside commission or committee to make certain investigations. I take it that is not within the province of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman allow me a question? There is no doubt, I suppose, that the Committee on Rules have the right to report the resolution.

Mr. MANN. I should say myself that the Committee on Rules has no jurisdiction over the matter. That is the question I raised; that they have not the right to report the resolution.

Mr. COCKRAN. I take it that even if the point of order be well taken against considering the report now, all the committee need do would be to walk out and report a resolution for its immediate consideration.

Mr. MANN. That is the very point of order that I make, that the committee can make no such report.

Mr. COCKRAN. They could report an order of business at any time. Would there be any practical difference between considering this report now and waiting long enough to allow of their walking right out and reporting a resolution that this question be considered at once?

Mr. MANN. They can.

Mr. COCKRAN. Then it is a question of the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee.

Mr. MANN. Well, let us see whether it is or not.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman from Illinois concedes that the Committee on Rules has jurisdiction over the business of the House. This is a question relating to immigration, upon which the House has been legislating. It would be entirely competent for the Committee on Rules to refer this investigation to the Committee on Naturalization and Immigration of the House; it would be equally competent for the Committee on Rules to refer it to a special committee. Now, the proposition to refer is simply a proposition to refer it to a special committee, namely, the special commission, and is fairly, therefore, within the power of the Committee on Rules, as it relates to the business of the House.

Mr. MANN. The distinction, which is clearly drawn, the gentleman seems not to have caught. He says that I concede that the Committee on Rules has jurisdiction of the business of the House. Not at all. The Committee on Rules has jurisdiction over the order of the business of the House. That is a very clear distinction. They can bring in a rule relating to the order of business of the House, but they have no jurisdiction to report upon the actual business of the House. They can not report an appropriation bill; they can not report upon any bills that come before the House except as to the order of business. Now, here is a proposition reported from the Committee on Rules to confer jurisdiction, not upon a regular committee of the House, nor upon a select committee, but upon an outside committee entirely, with which the House has nothing to do.

Mr. DALZELL. It is composed partly of membership of the House itself—a committee raised by the House in the first instance.

Mr. MANN. It was by an act of Congress, and not by the House.

Mr. DALZELL. It was raised in the first place by an amendment to a bill put on in the House of Representatives, agreed to in the Senate, and which thereafter became law.

Mr. MANN. An act of Congress.

Mr. DALZELL (continuing). And it is constituted of Members of both Houses. It is just as competent for the House to appoint a committee from outside members on any matter as to which it has jurisdiction as to appoint a committee from its own Members upon any such questions.

Mr. MANN. By act of Congress, not by the action of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. DALZELL. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt about the fact that the Committee on Rules has jurisdiction over the question of referring matters of business to committees, whether those committees be standing committees of the House or special committees to be selected by the Speaker. There is no doubt about the fact that it would have jurisdiction in a proper case to refer this matter to a committee consisting not altogether, or indeed at all, of Members of the House. Now, if that be the case, then it follows that if this resolution had named the men who constitute this commission as a committee to whom this matter should be referred, then it would be in order. Now then, what is the difference between naming the men and using the designation "members of the Immigration Commission?" The Committee on Rules has absolute jurisdiction over the order of business, and the reference of business to committees and to special committees, as well as standing committees.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman overlooks this fact, that in the practice of the House the question of consideration can not be raised on a report from the Committee on Rules, while if the Committee on Rules reported a resolution providing a time when this resolution should be taken up the question of consideration could be raised if it were attempted to take up that business in the way it is reported by the committee. There is considerable difference between a committee reporting matters which it is privileged to report at any time, and attempting to go outside of its jurisdiction and report on a question over which it has no jurisdiction. If the contention of the gentleman be correct, it would be possible to refer to a commission anything that comes before this House by having this committee to report it. It is in order for the committee to bring in an order setting a time for the consideration of an order referring the question to the Commission, and then a Member could exercise his own right under the rules and have the question of consideration passed upon.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman seems to think that this resolution involves the enactment of legislation upon the subject-matter of immigration. It does not. It only refers certain matters to a committee for a fair and impartial investigation and report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it does.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It does not. It merely refers a matter to be investigated to a certain body, appointed by the resolution, as a committee for the purpose of investigating it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But it does confer power upon a statutory commission which it does not have at present.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; it simply requests the Immigration Commission to make the investigation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is prepared to rule.

Clause 61 of Rule XI provides that—

The following named committees shall have leave to report at any time on the matters herein stated:

The Committee on Rules—on rules, joint rules, and order of business.

The Chair recollects, and has confirmed his recollection, referring to page 279 of the Manual, that in the Fifty-first Congress, in paragraph 10 to Rule XVI, was to be found the following:

No dilatory motion shall be entertained by the Speaker.

In the Fifty-second or Fifty-third Congress, Speaker Crisp being in the chair, clause 10 to Rule XVI was omitted when the rules were adopted. In the Fifty-fourth Congress clause 10 to Rule XVI was reinserted, again providing that—

No dilatory motion shall be entertained by the Speaker.

But in the Fifty-second or Fifty-third Congress these words were added:

It shall always be in order to call up for consideration a report from the Committee on Rules; and pending the consideration thereof the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House may adjourn; but after the result is announced he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion until the said report shall have been fully disposed of.

The object of that amendment to Rule XI was to prevent dilatory motions on reports made from the Committee on Rules. What are those reports? Reports on rules, joint rules, and order of business.

In the Fifty-fourth Congress, Mr. Reed again becoming Speaker, the clause referred to a moment ago came into the rule again, and the clause the Chair has just read remained in the rule as adopted under Mr. Speaker Crisp. So the Chair is of the opinion that privileged reports from the Committee on Rules are reports on rules, joint rules, and order of business.

Now, undoubtedly, if this report had covered the creation of a special committee of the House, or had designated any committee of the House to perform this investigation, in the opinion of the Chair it would have been privileged; or, perchance, even if it had designated a joint committee of the two Houses. But the Commission referred to is one created by law, and consists of three Members of the last House of the Fifty-ninth Congress, three members of the Senate of the Fifty-ninth Congress, and three others, not members of Congress, but appointed by the President. This is a continuing Commission. It has passed beyond the jurisdiction of the House or the jurisdiction of the Senate as such.

The Chair is of the opinion, on examination, that the point of order taken by the gentleman from Illinois is well taken.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was going to ask unanimous consent that the resolution be so changed as to read that this matter be referred to a special committee of seven, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House.

The SPEAKER. Well, but there would have to be unanimous consent to consider the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman now asks unanimous consent to consider the resolution which has just been reported at this time.

Mr. DALZELL. I hope the gentleman will withhold that request. I think this matter ought to go back again for further consideration by the Committee on Rules, and we can determine then what is the proper thing to be done.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I am perfectly willing to do that.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman move to recommit the resolution? The Chair supposes it will go to the Calendar unless some disposition is made of it.

Mr. DALZELL. I move to recommit it to the Committee on Rules.

The motion was agreed to.

DAM ACROSS SAVANNAH RIVER.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16621) permitting the building of a dam across the Savannah River at Cherokee Shoals. The author of this bill is the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. AIKEN, and in his absence, at his request, I wish to call the bill up.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Hugh MacRae Company, a corporation organized under the laws of South Carolina, its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to construct and maintain a dam across the Savannah River extending from a point in Elbert County, Ga., to a point in Abbeville County, S. C., upon or in the vicinity of Cherokee Shoals, and all works incident thereto in the utilization of the power thereby developed, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to amend or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

Amend the bill as follows: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the time for commencing and completing the dam authorized by the act of Congress approved March 2, 1907, entitled 'An act permitting the building of a dam across the Savannah River at Cherokee Shoals,' is hereby extended to one year and three years, respectively, from March 2, 1908."

Amend the title so as to read as follows: "To extend the time for the construction of a dam across Savannah River at Cherokee Shoals."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CONDEMNED BRASS CANNON FOR MONUMENT ASSOCIATION, FRANKLIN, TENN.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13077) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish four condemned brass cannon and cannon balls to the Confederate Monument Association at Franklin, Tenn.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion to furnish to the Confederate Monument Association, of Franklin, Williamson County, Tenn., four brass or bronze condemned field pieces or cannon with a suitable outfit of cannon balls which may not be needed in the service, the same to be used in the park surrounding the monument on the public square of the town of Franklin, Tenn., and to be subject at all times to the order of the Secretary of War: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States in the delivery of the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I supposed there was a general law that provided for furnishing condemned cannon.

Mr. PADGETT. The law only authorizes the furnishing of cast-iron, and does not authorize the furnishing of brass cannon.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman from New York that there is no law covering this. Brass cannon are valuable, being worth several cents a pound, and the law with reference to the donating of cannon does not apply to brass cannon; and even if it did, the law does not apply to donating cannon to Confederate monuments; it applies to municipalities and the Grand Army. So it would require a special act for this purpose in any event.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PADGETT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

A LEGAL CORD OF WOOD IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 14772) prescribing what shall constitute a legal cord of wood in the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter a legal cord of wood in the District of Columbia shall consist of and contain 128 cubic feet.

SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts in conflict with or inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed in so far and only in so far as they conflict or are inconsistent herewith.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF OAK STREET NW.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 4060) authorizing the extension of Oak street NW.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That under and in accordance with the provisions of sections 491a to 491n, both inclusive, of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, within thirty days after the passage of this act, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute in the supreme court of the District of Columbia a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary for the extension of Oak street NW. from its present terminus east of Center street to Fourteenth street NW., with a width of 50 feet.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $300, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia to provide the necessary funds for the costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto, to be repaid to the District of Columbia from the assessment for benefits when the same are collected, and a sufficient sum to pay the amounts of all judgments and awards is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1 strike out in lines 3, 4, and 5, commencing with the word "of" in line 3, down to and including the comma after the word "inclusive" in line 5.

Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ninety."

Strike out all of section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. That the entire amount found to be due and awarded by the jury in said proceeding as damages for and in respect of the land to be condemned for said extension, plus the cost and expenses of said proceeding, shall be assessed by the jury as benefits: Provided, That nothing in said subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of said Code shall be construed to authorize the jury to assess less than the aggregate amount of the damages awarded for and in respect of the land to be condemned and the costs and expenses of the proceedings hereunder.

"SEC. 3. That there is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia an amount sufficient to pay the necessary costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto and for the payment of amounts awarded as damages; to be repaid to the District of Columbia from the assessments for benefits and covered into the Treasury to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time and passed.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of District bills.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. MANN in the chair.

EXTENSION OF KENYON STREET.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 11767) to provide for the extension of Kenyon street from Seventeenth street to Mount Pleasant street, and for the extension of Seventeenth street from Kenyon street to Irving street, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan to the fact that the bill appears to be on the House Calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the Clerk will find that it has been transferred by order of the Speaker to the Union Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is correct and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11767) to provide for the extension of Kenyon street from Seventeenth street to Mount Pleasant street, and for the extension of Seventeenth street from Kenyon street to Irving street, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That under and in accordance with the provisions of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, within ninety days after the passage of this act, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute in the supreme court of the District of Columbia a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary to extend Kenyon street from Seventeenth street to Mount Pleasant street with a width of 80 feet, and to extend Seventeenth street from Kenyon street to Irving street with a width of 90 feet: Provided, however, That the entire amount found to be due and awarded by the jury in said proceeding as damages for and in respect of the land to be condemned for said extension, plus the costs and expenses of said proceeding, shall be assessed by the jury as benefits: And provided further, That nothing in said subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of said Code shall be construed to authorize the jury to assess less than the aggregate amount of the damages awarded for and in respect of the land to be condemned and the costs and expenses of the proceeding hereunder.

SEC. 2. That there is hereby appropriated, one-half from the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, an amount sufficient to pay the necessary costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto and for the payment of amounts awarded as damages, to be repaid to the District of Columbia from the assessments for benefits and covered into the Treasury to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the United States in equal parts.

SEC. 3. That Public Act No. 25 entitled "An act authorizing the extension of Seventeenth street NW.," approved January 22, 1907, and Public Act No. 28 entitled "An act authorizing the extension of Kenyon street NW.," approved January 22, 1907, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 10, strike out the comma and the word "one-half."

Page 2, line 11, strike out the word "from" and insert in lieu thereof the words "out of."

Page 2, line 11, strike out the words "and one-half.'

Page 2, strike out all of line 12.

Page 2, line 18, strike out all after the word "Columbia" and insert a period in lieu thereof.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman explain wherein this measure differs from the usual bill providing for the opening of streets in the District of Columbia?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would be glad to, but I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] who reported the bill.

Mr. SIMS. I did not quite catch the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I asked why a special act of legislation is necessary other than general legislation that provides for opening streets in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SIMS. In the last Congress there were separate acts passed, one as to Kenyon street, and one as to Seventeenth street; and upon investigation it was found that the land in each bill to some extent overlapped. The Commissioners therefore thought best to have both condemnation proceedings tried together, and began the proceedings, but ascertained that by oversight the time for commencing the proceedings as to one of the streets had expired, so that to get out of the difficulty and to have the trouble of the overlapping avoided they have prepared and sent this bill here repealing the two other acts and providing for this one condemnation for both streets.

Mr. STAFFORD. The general law is not applicable to this case, and this bill seeks to amend certain special acts passed in the last Congress?

Mr. SIMS. The general law will not accomplish everything, because we can not repeal the former acts in the general law, and therefore this special act is necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. This special act providing for these streets, as I understand, was passed prior to the enactment of the general law?

Mr. SIMS. I think not. They were both passed under the general law at the last session of Congress, but it was found that the two pieces of land to be condemned to some extent lapped.

Mr. STAFFORD. And there were conditions to which the general law did not apply and this is to meet those conditions.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; that is the fact. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

WIDENING TWENTIETH STREET NW.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 12678) for the widening of Twentieth street NW., District of Columbia, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That under and in accordance with the provisions of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, within ninety days after the passage of this act, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed, for the purpose of widening Twentieth street NW., to institute proceedings to condemn all that part of lot 15 of Richard E. Pairo's subdivision of "Rosemount Park," as recorded in book, county, six, page 78, surveyor's office, District of Columbia, lying within the lines of Twentieth street NW., north of Park road and lying west of the radial line of lot No. 30, block No. 4, Ingleside subdivision: Provided, however, That the entire amount found to be due and awarded by the jury in said proceeding as damages for and in respect of the land to be condemned for said extension, plus the costs and expenses of said proceeding, shall be assessed by the jury as benefits: And provided further, That nothing in said subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of said Code shall be construed to authorize the jury to assess less than the aggregate amount of the damages awarded for and in respect of the land condemned and the costs and expenses of the proceedings hereunder.

SEC. 2. That there is hereby appropriated, one-half from the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, an amount sufficient to pay the necessary costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto and for the payment of amounts awarded as damages; to be repaid to the District of Columbia from the assessments for benefits and covered into the Treasury to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the United States in equal parts.

With the following amendments:

Page 2, line 12, strike out the comma, and the words "one-half" after the word "appropriated."
Page 2, line 13, strike out the word "from" and insert in lieu thereof the words "out of," and at the end of said line strike out the words "and one-half."
Page 2, strike out all of line 14.
Page 2, lines 20 and 21, strike out all after the word "Columbia" in line 20.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the chairman of the committee to explain the reason why there should be a special legislation in this case that makes it necessary to take it out of the general law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, this follows the law as passed by the last Congress.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, as I understand the gentleman, the bill is in conformity to the general law?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

OPENING OF JEFFERSON AND FIFTH STREETS NW.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 11776) for the opening of Jefferson and Fifth streets NW., District of Columbia, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., that within sixty days after the passage of this act the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, sitting as a district court, under and in accordance with the terms and provisions of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary for the extension of Jefferson street NW., in the subdivision of Brightwood Park, from its present eastern terminus east of Sixth street to the proposed east line of Fifth street west, with a width of 90 feet, and for the extension of Fifth street NW., in the subdivision of Brightwood Park, from its present southern terminus south of Kennedy street to the proposed north line of Jefferson street, with a width of 90 feet, according to the permanent system of highway plans adopted in and for the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That assessments shall be made by the jury as benefits as contemplated in section 491 g of said subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of said Code: Provided, That the total amount found to be due and awarded as damages, plus the costs and expenses of the proceedings taken pursuant hereto, shall be assessed by the jury as benefits: Provided, however, That nothing in said subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of said Code shall be construed to authorize the jury to assess less than the total amount found to be due and awarded as damages for and in respect to the land condemned and the costs and expenses of the proceedings hereunder.

SEC. 3. That there is hereby appropriated, one-half from the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, an amount sufficient to pay the necessary costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto and for the payment of amounts awarded as damages, to be repaid to the District of Columbia from the assessments for benefits and covered into the Treasury to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the United States in equal parts.

With the following amendments:

Page 2, line 12, strike out the comma, and the words "one-half" after the word "appropriated."
Page 2, line 13, strike out the word "from" and insert in lieu thereof the words "out of," and at the end of said line strike out the words "and one-half."
Page 2, strike out all of line 14.
Page 2, lines 20 and 21, strike out all after the word "Columbia" in line 20.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

METROPOLITAN POLICE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (S. 2872) to amend an act to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1901, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress approved March 1, 1905, entitled "An act to amend section 4 of an act entitled 'An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia,'" is hereby amended by extending its provisions in behalf of the chief engineer of the fire department, and all other officers of said department of and above the rank of captain, to any chief engineer of the fire department and all other officers of said department of and above the rank of foreman, who were retired and pensioned in pursuance of law prior to the approval of said act.

With the following amendment:

Page 2, strike out the period after word "act," in line 3, and insert a colon, and add the following:
"Provided, That when retired the present chief engineer of the fire department of the District of Columbia shall receive as retired pay a sum equal to one-half of the salary allowed by law at the date of retirement."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendments.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to yield for a question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR], who made the report.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the bill under consideration, it seeks merely to raise the pensions of certain officers of the fire department in the District?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Four men only, who have retired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it a general law raising the pensions under the law passed at the last Congress a certain percentage, so as to apply not only to these designated officials, but to all in the future?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. No; it simply takes care of four men. It can not apply to anybody in the future; it provides for four men who, by reason of their rank, would be under the present law entitled to an increase of pension, but who retired shortly before its passage. I will state more fully, if the gentleman will allow me for a moment. There are four men. The fire marshal, Mr. Drew, who is a man 73 years of age, now under the old law receiving $50 a month. He would get under this amendment $75. The next man is Mr. Sorrell, assistant chief of the department, retired, who would receive $75 instead of $50 under the old law. The next are two foremen who were injured in the performance of their duty and who receive $50, and by this legislation would receive $65 a month.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the need of making a special exception of these four District officials? Why not make the law general, so as to apply to all who hold these positions in the future——

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. These are men who were retired prior to the enactment of the present law, and this brings them in the provisions of the present law.

Mr. STAFFORD. This refers to men in the service prior to the enactment of that law?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMS. This is not the case providing for retirement upon half pay of the chief of the fire department?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes; that is an amendment added to this bill.

Mr. SIMS. That amendment is not yet being considered?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes; it is being considered.

Mr. SIMS. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, in so far as that part relating to the four men I agree, but in so far as the retirement of the chief on half pay instead of a pension, I understand that to be establishing a new precedent.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. No; if the gentleman will permit an explanation of that. The present fire chief receives a salary of $3,500 a year that has recently been given him, two years ago, I think. He is a man who has been in the Washington fire department for forty-five years' continuous service, starting in as a boy under the old volunteer fire department and working up to every grade until he has been made chief of the department. He has never during this time had one charge of misconduct or any blot upon his reputation. Several members of the committee, believing that such a remarkable record in such a hazardous employment should receive some recognition, introduced an amendment, which the committee has adopted, providing that instead of receiving $100 a month, which he would receive upon retirement, he will receive $145.83⅓, or one-half of his present pay. Now, this is largely sentimental. It is the intention to reward a man who has had a remarkable career in the public service, who has the regard of every man in the department and of every citizen of Washington. He and the department have the regard of the people of Baltimore after their work in that great catastrophe, and the committee feel it would be good for the department to know that a fire chief with such a record should have this additional compensation. I will state further, for the gentleman's information, that the amendment specifically states that it shall apply only to the present fire chief when he is retired.

Mr. STAFFORD. How about the other four officials? Is this law retroactive giving them an increased pension from the time the old law went into effect?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. No, sir; it goes into effect when the law is passed only.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, a word further. Does this amendment put Chief Belt on the pension roll at $145 on retirement?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. It comes from the pension fund. I will say, as probably all know, it comes from the pension fund. They retire at a certain time and under certain conditions get a pension of a stipulated amount. All the men in the department receive this. This money, as gentlemen know, is raised by the payment of a dollar a month by each fireman and policeman, and the deficiency is made up from the police-court fines, which are largely in excess of the amount needed, and dog licenses, and, therefore, there is no money appropriated out of any fund. All the money is there, more than enough to take care of this.

Mr. SIMS. It is not a charge upon any fund produced by taxation, which the Government of the United States pays any part——

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. No part whatever.

Mr. SIMS. And the District of Columbia pays no part.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. No part whatever.

Mr. SIMS. It does give to the chief, if this act is passed, additional to what he would otherwise get, as stated by the gentleman.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. That is exactly it.

Mr. SIMS. What would the chief get on retirement if this law was not passed?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. A hundred dollars a month.

Mr. SIMS. And this gives him $145 a month?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. One hundred and forty-five dollars and eighty-three and a third cents.

Mr. SIMS. I understand that will not reduce the fund so as to prevent any other party entitled to participation therein from receiving from the fund all he now receives if the bill does pass?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Absolutely none. There is an abundance of money from the police court fines, which are turned over every year to the District for its use, in excess of that which is turned into the pension fund.

Mr. SIMS. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, not being from a large city and not acquainted with these matters as well as gentlemen who are from large cities, I do not feel willing to establish a precedent which will have to be followed. I stated to the committee that I would not agree to support it, and that I did not think I would oppose it; but there are gentlemen who are Members of the House who, I think, ought to be consulted, at least, about establishing new precedents, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], two of the members of the Appropriation Committee, told me they wanted to be present when this matter was considered, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] tells me he has just sent for them and they will be here in a moment. And I would be glad if this bill could be——

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. All gentlemen on the floor have the opportunity to be here. There is no secrecy about this bill. It has been on the Calendar for the past three weeks. We have no objection to the matter being discussed.

Mr. SIMS. I see that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is present.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] desires to ask me any question or make any statement, he is at liberty to do so.

Mr. SIMS. As I said, I do not want to consent to make a precedent.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I decline to wait for gentlemen to come on the floor of the House.

Mr. SIMS. I only made the request out of courtesy to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], and, of course, I can not in any way shape the course of the gentleman from Ohio, in charge of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, I believe that the recommendations of the committee, as embodied in this bill, are in consonance with the practice of some large cities in the country, and conform in that particular to the pensions paid in those cities.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. It does; yes, sir.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice in the report it is in line with the practice of some of the leading cities of the country, including Chicago, Baltimore, Boston, Philadelphia, New York, Milwaukee, and Pittsburg.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. And I will say further, for the gentleman's information, that it absolutely establishes no precedent, as these are the only persons whom it can possibly benefit. There are no further persons of that rank who could possibly come within the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman explain, in view of that statement and the report, whether the provisions of this bill are the same in amount as in the other cities?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. That I can not give in detail, because they do vary some; but I think the pension funds in other cities are at least as large and in some they are larger. The salaries of the officers I know are larger in most of the cities mentioned.

Mr. MADDEN. What was the old law on this?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. These men are drawing under the old law $50 a month. The present law allows them anything up to $100 a month. The Commissioners have informed us that the amount in the report will be allowed if this bill goes through. The present law allows $100 a month to officers up to the chief. The chief would receive $100 a month if he retired under the present law.

Mr. MADDEN. And under this he would receive $1,750?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Or $145 and a fraction per month. It is not a radical increase. It is simply an attempt to give recognition to a man who has had a most remarkable record in a hazardous service without a mark against his name.

Mr. MADDEN. How many men does this affect?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Four men and the chief. It can affect no more, we assure you.

Mr. MADDEN. If this bill is passed and a policy is inaugurated, is it not likely that a new bill will be brought in that would affect everybody in the Department?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. There can be no such thing. The House in the last year passed a liberal pension bill. We are only seeking to reach four men who, by reason of retiring a short time before its passage, are barred from this pension.

Mr. MADDEN. There was a time when all the great cities in the country allowed officers one-half the salary at retirement after they had served a certain number of years, but that policy has been changed in some of the cities. It may not have been changed in all of them, but in some of them it has, and the tendency to allow one-half the pay at retirement drew so heavily upon the firemen's pension fund that it was impossible to maintain a fund sufficient to meet it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I will state to the gentleman that this measure specifically applies to the present chief only. And then I will state further that there is a large excess of money which can be turned over into the pension fund if necessary; some police court funds, which have never been called upon as yet.

The fund has never reached anything like the limit of being exhausted, and the sum of money involved is not over $150.

Mr. MADDEN. It is not much; but the question is as to the policy, whether it is wise to adopt the policy.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. The committee feel that it is always wise to recognize cases of such peculiar significance. We have carefully investigated the matter, and I will say that there are no other men employed in this peculiar line of employment with a record that surpasses that of Fire Chief Belt, of the District of Columbia, and for that reason we want to give him this recognition of his service while he lives to enjoy it.

Mr. MADDEN. He is going out of the fire department?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I hope not; but he is an old man; he may go out at any time the fire bell rings, because he has met with many severe injuries during his career.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Ohio speaks altogether of the chief of the fire department and his meritorious service, but still the bill provides additional compensation for other firemen.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. For other men who have had remarkably good records, as set out in the report of the committee, and very old men, two of them. The same thing that applies to the chief of the fire department applies to each of them.

Mr. MADDEN. It does not give the same in proportion to others.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Two of these had long, continuous service, while not quite of the same special merit as the case of the chief of the fire department, but we have extended the same provision to them. These men are on the retired list, and they are barred by reason of that fact.

Mr. MADDEN. They are out of the service?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. They are on the retired list, at $50 a month. That is the limit; we give them the limit up to $100.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state who they are?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. They are W. O. Drew, the retired fire marshal, who is 79 years of age; W. T. Sorrell, retired assistant chief, 73 years of age when he was retired, and now 79 years of age; C. S. Boss, foreman, now 56 years of age, and the other, W. E. Robertson, now 44 years of age. He was retired at the age of 36, being injured very early in his career. As to the first two, they will get very little out of it, and the other two are very worthy cases.

Mr. MADDEN. The committee has given very careful consideration to the subject, I suppose?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I will state to the gentleman I am chairman of the committee on ways and means of the committee, and we have gone very carefully over the subject, and if the gentleman will read the report of the committee, he will find that it is much fuller than that of the Senate, and that it is nothing but simple justice to these men.

Mr. MADDEN. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MANN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 2872 and various House bills and had directed him to report some with and some without amendment, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills do pass.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the various bills and amendments.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the previous question is ordered upon the various bills to the final passage.

HOUSE BILLS WITH AMENDMENTS PASSED.

In the following House bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with amendments, the amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole were agreed to; the bills as amended were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time and passed:

A bill (H. R. 11767) to provide for the extension of Kenyon street from Seventeenth street to Mount Pleasant street, and for the extension of Seventeenth street from Kenyon street to Irving street, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 12678) for the widening of Twentieth street NW., District of Columbia; and

A bill (H. R. 11776) for the opening of Jefferson and Fifth streets NW., District of Columbia.

SENATE BILL PASSED.

In the bill (S. 2872) to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1901, reported from the Committee of the Whole with an amendment, the amendment was agreed to, the bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Michigan, a motion to reconsider the several votes by which the various bills were passed was laid on the table.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 17288, a bill making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909. Pending that, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas, representing the minority, how much general debate we can agree on now?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am unable to say definitely how much will be required. I do not know. There is quite a demand for time for debate on this side of the House, but several of the Members who desired time are not present. They did not expect the bill to be called up so soon. I think they will be here later in the afternoon, and I ask that you let debate go on for the time.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that general debate may run to-day and that half of the time may be controlled by myself and the other by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] asks unanimous consent that the general debate to-day be controlled by himself and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], the time to be equally divided. Is there objection?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That does not limit the debate, but only arranges for to-day's debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. HULL was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 17288) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, with Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, this bill has been reported and on the Calendar for several days, so that I assume the Members of the House are reasonably familiar with its provisions. In its total amount it carries, in round numbers, about $7,000,000 more than the bill for the current fiscal year, and yet the committee eliminated from the estimates submitted by the Department something over $9,000,000, leaving it, as I say, some $7,000,000 more than the bill for the current year. If we had given the full amount asked for, this measure would carry about $16,000,000 in excess of present law.

The demand for increases in all lines has been made in such a way that it was almost impossible to avoid a larger increase than we have given. It seems to me that I should now call attention to the items entirely eliminated from the bill by the committee, so that the Members of the House interested in these items can give consideration to the reasons which influenced the committee in their entire elimination from the bill.

The first two items eliminated were in regard to a telephone system at interior posts and artillery posts. There was an estimate of something over $105,000 for these items, practically new items, and yet, in the judgment of the committee, if the situation were so that we could reasonably allow them, items that would probably be of benefit in the administration of the different posts of the country. But we have gotten along up to this period of our history without this service, and in view of the large increases made in other lines, which were necessary to be made, it seemed to the committee that here was one point at least where something might be saved and allow the matter to go over for another year.

Another item of $1,000,000 eliminated was for maneuvers. This $1,000,000 does not represent all that was cut out of the bill on account of maneuvers, because this applies only to the militia, while, if we should have the maneuvers this year, we would be required to have a larger appropriation for the regular establishment than we have given.

The committee, I think without exception, feels that, in reason, the maneuvers by which the regular force and the State militia are brought together are of great benefit. There is no disposition to decry the benefits that have come through the closer association of the National Guard, so called, and the regular establishment. But, Mr. Chairman, these maneuvers have only been of recent years. When started they were to be only about every third year. They have grown up until they are practically now every year. They only benefit a small portion of the guard each year. If the maneuvers were on a different scale, where all the guards of the different States were assembled in their State encampments for their ten days' or two weeks' drilling and representatives of the regular establishment were sent there, so that all arms of the service would be represented, all of the militia of all the States would have the benefit of this close contact with the regular organization every year. Only one regiment at a time from a State can be taken into the annual grand encampment recommended by the Department. That gives but small advantage to the guard as a whole, while if the Regulars were brought to the States, all the guard would have all the benefit each year. Then the Congress once in three years could appropriate for the grand maneuvers, whereby all the guards and all the Regulars could be brought into camps of concentration, and you would have the training that comes more to the officers than men in these grand maneuvers. In fact, Mr. Chairman, I think that a very large part of the demand for the maneuvers on a grand scale each year for the militia comes from the adjutants-general of the States more than from the guard proper. We must not forget that, no matter how we may legislate, the National Guard is primarily a State organization. It is not intended to be and can not be primarily a Federal organization.

Great good is coming to the country, in my judgment, in its thorough equipment and being well disciplined. It makes a reserve force which in case of need can be brought into line with the Regulars and help to hold what we call the first line of defense until the volunteers proper can be whipped into shape. They have a bill now before the Committee on Militia going a long way toward making it more of a Federal than a State organization. What the Committee on Militia may do with that bill of course no one can yet tell. But I hope they may get it in such shape as to insure its adoption by this Congress.

We had a million dollars last year and a million dollars the year before for these grand maneuvers. I think the year before last was the best maneuvers we ever had, but I do insist that at this time, with our expenses running away with us on other lines, with a budget for the support of the Army increased by seven millions now, and an increase certainly of five millions more if a provision incorporated in the bill increasing the pay of the enlisted force shall prevail, and an increase of $2,200,00 more if another provision shall be incorporated increasing the pay of the officers, all of which I will come to later—I insist, I say, that this year's maneuvers may well be dropped out. In my judgment, the elimination of this million dollars, with the decrease of some $500,000 in appropriations for the regular establishment as a result of not providing for maneuvers, is not doing any injury to the service and is in the line of good legislation, under present conditions.

We eliminated entirely $200,000 for the purchase of special apparatus in the Surgeon-General's Department. That came to us in a supplementary estimate too late to give it the consideration it should have, and, as we had increased the appropriation for the Surgeon-General's medical supplies so that he could accumulate a reserve supply and be ready for an increased Army, we believed that the special apparatus could go over without any injury to the service.

Another estimate submitted to us was $100,000 to teach rifle practice to children in the public schools. It did seem to the committee that a proposition to take charge of the education of the children in the public schools and teach them rifle practice was going further than was legitimate for this Government to do. I think the committee was unanimously opposed to that; if any were in favor of it I do not now recall. These are the items that we eliminated from the bill.

We have incorporated new legislation, some of it very important. The main if not the only one of general interest and importance is found on page 6 of the bill, after the provision for paying the enlisted men. We have put in a full revision of the pay of the entire enlisted force of the Army. We increased the privates $2 a month on the first enlistment, and we make a large increase in the pay of the noncommissioned officers. We provide a three-months' practical bounty for each reenlistment so that we can keep in those who have received training. The largest individual increase in the noncommissioned officers is for the first sergeant. He has been the poorest-paid noncommissioned officer of the regiment up to this time. We give him the same pay that we give to the regimental sergeant, the sergeant-major, the quartermaster-sergeant, the commissary-sergeant, and all other noncommissioned staff of the regiment. I want to say that I voice the impression of all the Members of this House who served in the Army at any time in its history, on either side in any conflict, when I say that the orderly sergeant is the most important noncommissioned officer in the regiment. I have had letters from old retired officers since we reported the measure, congratulating the committee on at last doing justice to the first sergeant, as they call them now. We called them while I was in the civil war orderly sergeants. They congratulated me and the committee in doing justice to the first sergeant, and stating that a good first sergeant of a company is worth more than two raw lieutenants who have just graduated from West Point.

They have reached their position by high character and faithful service. Under the law as it stands to-day the Army is and has been losing the best of its noncommissioned officers. Under the law as we have provided it here now, in my judgment, the noncommissioned force of the Army, after they reach the better grades, will make the Army a profession and remain in the Army all their active lives.

I do not believe that the privates will remain in for any great length of time as privates. They may come in for two and possibly three enlistments, but after the third enlistment the man who has not secured some noncommissioned rank, from corporal up, is not considered a very good man to make a good soldier out of—at least that is the evidence before us. This increase of pay will cost us at least $4,900,000 to meet this increased cost so far as the enlisted force is concerned.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What are the noncommissioned officers in the regiment?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Quartermaster-sergeant, sergeant-major of the regiment, commissary-sergeant, all the sergeants of the companies—and I have not given all the others, there are so many of them—and then the corporals. I would have to read from the Army Register to be sure of naming all.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Everything below a lieutenant?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Everything below a lieutenant and above a private; they are grouped in classes in this bill. But I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the statement that this will only cost about $5,000,000 more than now provided may mislead, for this reason: That under the pay of to-day the Army is about twenty to twenty-two thousand short in its enlisted force. I believe that this increased pay, with the increased ration that has been provided by the President—and we appropriate nearly $500,000 extra to pay for this increase of cost of rations in this bill—will induce enlistments enough to fill the ranks of the Army up to the number now authorized by law.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Can the gentleman tell us what proportion of this increase goes to the private soldier and what proportion goes to the officers?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not a dollar goes to the officers. Every dollar of this increase goes to the enlisted force in the Army, but I say it would be misleading for me to say to the House that the total extra expense on account of adopting this amendment will be $5,000,000, because if this increased pay induces enlistment to the maximum fixed by the President to-day, which is the minimum authorized under the law, and we will have an increase of at least eight or nine million in the pay of the Army—seven million, anyway. We have heretofore cut off part of the pay of the enlisted force in making appropriations for the Army, because we could safely allow for a certain shortage in the enlisted force, but I submit to this committee that what we want in this country is an army filled to the number fixed by the President, which would be about 62,000 men. In a nation of 80,000,000 people, covering the vast extent of territory reaching from the China Sea across the Pacific Ocean, across the continent and over to Porto Rico, with the great Territory of Alaska taking at least 1,000 of our men, with the Hawaiian group taking about 2,000, and certain, I believe, to be increased largely beyond that number in the coast defenses for the protection of that island and our Pacific coast, with the number that we must keep in the Philippine Islands and the number that we must keep here to recuperate, so that we can send them back to the Philippines, saying nothing at all about what we have in Cuba, which I hope will not bother us much longer, we can not afford to have less than 62,000 men in the regular establishment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the 62,000 include those who are enlisted in the Coast Artillery?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; but not in the Hospital Corps.

Mr. TAWNEY. That includes both branches of the service?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It includes all branches, but not the Hospital Corps. There are 3,500 in that corps that will not be included in the total given.

Mr. TAWNEY. How many are included in the militia, national or State?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They have increased their National Guard during the last year. They have now about 120,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. And under the Dick law the President of the United States has the power of calling upon the State troops for any service within continental United States.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. In time of war or rebellion.

Mr. TAWNEY. At any time.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They are proposing an amendment to this militia bill now, so that he can call them at any time, I think, but that has not been as yet reported from the Committee on Militia.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understood from one of the officers of the State militia in my State that under the Dick law—I have not personally examined it—the President has the power to direct the State militia of the State of Minnesota to go anywhere or in any service if it was confined to continental United States.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The President, if he can not enforce the law with the regular establishment of the United States, can order out the militia, and this being organized, would have to go first, but whenever there is a riot in the United States, or a rebellion against the constituted authority gets to the point where the regular establishment can not control it, then the limit of the power of the President over the militia is simply the limit fixed by the Constitution, which gives him the absolute control of all the able-bodied forces of the United States to preserve order and to protect property and uphold law any time that in his judgment it is absolutely necessary.

Mr. TAWNEY. That was my understanding, I will say to the gentleman. In view of that, and in view of the expenditures the Federal Government is now making for the maintenance of the National Guard, we have in effect a standing army of almost 200,000 men, or would have if the Regular Army was enlisted up to its maximum under the existing limitation.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The gentleman is mistaken in that, for this reason, that the line of cleavage between the National Guard and the Regular Army is clean cut from start to finish. You can not send your militia to Porto Rico, you can not send it to Cuba, you can not send it to the Philippine Islands, you can not send it to Alaska, you can not garrison the Hawaiian Islands with it. You have an army in service in the Tropics that can not remain there very long without its being utterly destructive to the health of the men, without destroying the organizations, without making it impossible for us to have an army if it is understood it is to serve in the Tropics continuously, and, as it is to-day, with the number of men we have in the Army to-day, two years is about as long as they can stay at home, and you are paying large sums for transportation every year because you have to be making exchanges so very often with those abroad. The men who come back this year have no certainty they will remain here more than two years before they go back again. That is not fair. If the Army be recruited to its full strength as fixed by the President, there is not any doubt but they will have at least one year longer at home than they now have. Another thing; while I believe that we can organize the militia on a basis of very great help to the Coast Artillery, yet to-day we have not enough regulars to man the guns that are now emplaced to defend our coasts. We authorized enough additional force in the artillery bill of last year to make one shift to the gun at the principal fortifications, but on account of the low pay, on account of the discrimination that has existed against the Army in favor of the Navy in the pay of its enlisted force—and I am not criticising the pay of the Navy—but if a man wanted to go into our service, and it was a question whether to enlist in the Navy or in the Army, if he once understood the great advantages that come from enlistment in the Navy, he would go into the Navy at once. If he came to investigate what was offered him in the Army, he would find nothing to attract him except the enthusiasm that some young men have for wearing the uniform of their country. Now, I believe this bill will give enough increase in our Army in the Coast Artillery to enable us to have one shift——

Mr. TAWNEY rose.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Now, if the gentleman will hear me one minute on this: I am in favor of going further in the aid of the militia to be trained for reserves for the Coast Artillery than I am in aiding the militia in any other line. I would be willing for the Federal Government to have entire control of Coast Artillery reserves in California, in Washington, and in Oregon, if the people there would furnish the recruits, because it would not be a large expense and would give to our Pacific coast at once a trained body of men who, in time of war, could step into the ranks and serve these great engines of war effectively from the very beginning.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. I did not interrupt the gentleman or ask him the questions I have for the purpose of laying any foundation for criticising the proposed increase of the enlisted men of the Army; in fact, we ought to grant some increase to that branch of the service. The fact I wanted to bring out was that for all practical purposes in times of war within continental United States itself we have to-day in effect a standing army of about 200,000 men, and that includes the National Guard.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. In time of war, yes, I think that is true. That is assuming every one of the guard would be able to enter.

Mr. TAWNEY. I mean an organized army of practically 200,000 men. That is what I wanted to bring out.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; so organized with the idea they could march right in, that there will be no delay in taking their place by the side of the regular establishment, and in time of war I want to say we are better fixed than that because we have a Regular Army that can be expanded immediately to 100,000, with trained officers, trained noncommissioned officers, enough trained privates to insure an effective army. A great many men object to our having so large a force of officers for so small an army, but I want to say to you that a well-trained body of officers is one of the best investments this Government can make, for when the time of stress comes these officers can practically lick into shape in a short time much more than 100,000 of regular force, and can look after the raw recruits and help us out on that. There has been, of course, a very large detail of these officers to schools and for other purposes, so that to-day the line of the Army is not properly officered. But I do not care to discuss that at this time.

There is one feature of this proposed new legislation that I want to call the attention of the House to, and that is found at the bottom of page 9, and relates to the military regimental bands. There has been for years a very widespread discontent because of the fact that the United States at every place where it had a post large enough for a regimental band was furnishing opposition to men in civil life who made a livelihood for themselves and their families as musicians. It was advertised to musicians as a means of inducing their enlistment into the Army that they could secure profitable employment for private purposes, and the Government paid them such a small stipend that the Government could not have received the enlistment of any musicians unless they permitted competition with outside civilian bands. But, gentlemen, I believe, and the committee, so far as I am able to judge, believe, that when the Government pays practically the living expenses of the man and gives him his $13 or $15 a month, his clothing, his house rent, his rations, his medical attendance, that it is unfair to the man in civil life to say that this man can go out and take the bread from the civilians by underbidding him on all these public occasions. And they would not even have to underbid them. If they proposed the same compensation nine times out of ten the glory of a military band would cause the citizens to employ it in place of the other. So we have provided in this bill a substantial increase in the pay of the musicians composing the band. We have made that increase substantially what it is to-day with a reasonable allowance for what they could make in their private contracts, and then make the further proviso that they shall not be permitted under any circumstances to compete with members of bands making their livelihood by their musical performances. In other words, we have divorced army bands from competition with the musicians of this country.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to know whether the provisions of the bill relating to musicians are such that a band could not go and attend a parade voluntarily, without pay, and thereby take the place of men who are not enlisted musicians?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will read the proviso to the gentleman. It says:

Provided, That army bands or members thereof shall not receive remuneration for furnishing music outside the limits of military posts when the furnishing of such music places them in competition with local civilian musicians.

Now, I should say it would prohibit their going if it cut an outside band out of employment, unless the army band should play free.

Mr. KEIFER. If it is employment that is prohibited, as it would seem by this clause, what would be the objection if the military commander at a post permitted a band to go and play on some parade day, or on some great occasion at some place, some city, or some town for nothing? What is there in the bill that would prohibit that?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I do not think anything in this bill would prohibit that. That would not be in competition.

Mr. KEIFER. That would be in competition if by their going without pay the other musicians who are not enlisted in any way were not employed.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Well, it would be a remote danger, and I think the proviso would not prohibit. Take, for instance, the Fourth of July; they always play then for nothing. Take Decoration Day, and wherever there is a post the band always plays for nothing. On occasions of that character this provision, in my judgment, would not interfere with it, but it would interfere with one feature of the matter that I think is a good one. Take, for instance, any Member of the House that represents a large city where there is a military post, and you will find at some of the county fairs they will plead with the Members to get the band sent there. They ought not to be sent to county fairs. They ought not to come in competition where bands play for money. They ought not to come in competition with a man that has to make a living for himself and family without any help from the Government, but by his own individual exertions. I do not believe that it would ever be construed that a band that would, for instance, if they should want to serenade my distinguished friend from Ohio, if he lived near the military post, or was visiting at a hotel near a military post, would not be prohibited. I do not understand that any of the courtesies that are extended would be prohibited, but competition with these bands is prohibited and, in my judgment, ought to be prohibited.

Mr. KEIFER. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Now, what I referred to a little while ago was to the fact that we have had a very hard time in securing recruits during the last year, and that in spite of the fact that we authorized a substantial increase in the Coast Artillery we have been unable to secure enlistments equal to the discharges, so that the Army is to-day smaller than it was one year ago, before we increased one branch of the service. I do not know that all of the fault of this can be laid to the small pay, but I think the larger part of it can. The Army, with the large posts which we are now establishing, with the fewer men to do the work, is a life of comparative drudgery. In the older posts, when they were scattered over the frontier, a little police duty was all that had to be done, and in my judgment the Department did put an additional burden upon the Army during the last year, so that it has made the enlisted men anxious to get out and keep out of the Army. They have introduced the practice march, which in itself is a good thing, and have loaded him with 40 pounds, to see how far he could go and how well he could carry it; and if his luggage did not make that amount, they put in foreign matter to raise it to the 40 pounds. The soldier does not like that kind of business. He did not have to do it, General [General KEIFER], when you were commanding him in the civil war. He had a wagon to carry his load, and if he did not have a wagon he got a contraband to do it, so that it was not loaded on him. If it becomes absolutely necessary to do this thing, why the American soldier will do it with as good grace as anybody else, but if he thinks it is not, he will escape from it as soon as he can, and he is going to keep out of the service, and going to make straight for his home as soon as his time of enlistment is completed.

Mr. GRAFF. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, certainly.

Mr. GRAFF. I notice that the gentleman from Iowa stated in a general way that there has been a decrease instead of an increase of the men in the Coast Artillery during the past year.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. In the Army, I stated, as a whole. I do not remember whether the Coast Artillery has been able to keep its men.

Mr. KEIFER. It has not.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I understand it has not. You will find in the report of the Secretary of War that there is a shortage of about 22,000 men. Instead of being able to keep up, it has run the other way. Now, I think another reason for some of the dissatisfaction is the fact that we have changed our staff system in the Army. We have got now a number of the most active young men in the world in our General Staff; and as we have not a very large amount of actual work to do outside of figuring over how to invade other countries, they are continually hunting up something more for the soldier to do. I am not one of those who believe in so large a General Staff. I believe we have too many of them. I think we would be better off if we had fewer staff officers and more officers with their companies. We have too large a number of schools. I understand we have to-day the best educated army in the world, but sometimes I wonder if we are not in danger of having a little overeducation. I do not think the man ought to be kept in post-graduate schools until he is 40 or 45 years of age before he has had much service in the field, for after that if we should have war I fear he would play the schoolmaster and argue out of going into the field where the fighting is to be done. We have done better with the old organization when we were engaged in war with other countries under the old staff system, better than the German system, so say the experts, who compared the two systems. The German system is largely the one upon which ours is now modeled.

I feel I want to say a word for the old system of the staff. I do not believe in your detailing from top to bottom. I believe in detailing for the lower grade up to lieutenant-colonel and major, and when the officer gets up to that let the detail become permanent. In time of war every officer that is worth a penny wants to be in the field, and they will leave your staff like rats running from a sinking ship, so as to go in the field where they may earn glory, and turn your staff over to young men who have no talent for it, and your staff system will break down at the very time you most need an experienced staff. Make your higher officers of the staff corps permanent and then make them ineligible to appointment in the line, and, in my judgment, this would do more to aid the military organization than almost anything proposed.

But you know we had a war with Spain. We expanded from 25,000 men to 250,000 men in two or three months. There was confusion, there was loss, there was distress, and there will be again if you expand from 60,000 to 250,000 men. But in place of the detailed staff at that time we had the old staff system. Some men say that was the reason we had this distress. It was not the cause of the distress, because the staff corps did their work admirably and well. There was not a man who could be reached by the trains who was not fed every day. They talk about the distress of bad beef, but you will have it under any system in hot weather where you are shipping it to the Tropics, where you are rushing everything to the front, and your railroads get congested, and the cars stand on the tracks with the ice all out of the refrigerator compartments.

We went to the Philippines. Our troops were cared for there. Fresh beef was distributed to every point where our boats could run every week, even in the Tropics. We went to China under the old-staff system, and when we struck China we came in contact with all the armies of Europe. The German army has been held up as the great organization that is perfect in all its parts. They have their general staff, but what did they do in China? They took their troops to China without clothing suitable to the climate. They took them without food suitable to the climate, or even sufficient in quantity to keep them in comfort, and the officers themselves had to purchase what they wanted to eat through the American commissary, thus administered by an old-staff officer of this country. The Quartermaster's Department of our Army was under the control of a permanent staff corps, the old staff. I think I could take up a great deal of time on this if I wanted to; but I have here a little statement that is made at my request by one of the officers of the Army, who was with the troops in China, and it tells exactly what happened there, and I will ask the Clerk to read it as a part of my remarks. It expresses the facts better than I can.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the year 1900 disturbances arose in China which resulted in what has passed into history as the Boxer rebellion. The legations of foreign powers were besieged in Peking by armed forces composed of imperial troops augmented by agitators and others. The German minister and the secretary of the Japanese legation were murdered, and the other members of the diplomatic corps were in serious danger of their lives. To relieve them and reestablish order, the troops of eight Governments—America, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, Russia, and Austria—gathered in China for a combined movement against the Chinese. The occasion afforded especial opportunities for comparison and contrast as to the military methods of these Governments and the result of their application.

Particularly interesting was the study of the Germans, who since their successful war with France, nearly forty years ago, have enjoyed the proud distinction of maintaining the most perfect and efficient military organization in the world. All governments to a greater or less extent have patterned after it and sought inspiration from the German general staff in the belief that superiority could be achieved in no way so well as by imitating them and following their methods. If their methods are as good under European conditions as they are reputed to be, they did not stand the test of a campaign a long distance from their base and in a country not provided with useful adjuncts to military operations which an old and thickly settled commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural country like Europe affords.

After the fall of Peking (in which the Germans took no part, as they were unable to arrive in time) the American forces were reduced. When orders were received for the withdrawal of a portion of the force, the rumor soon spread through Tientsin, then the German headquarters, that the Americans had received orders to withdraw. Almost immediately General von Gayl, the German officer corresponding to our chief quartermaster, came to the American military officers in Tientsin, accompanied by a young aid-de-camp, who spoke English perfectly and through whom the conversation was conducted, and said in substance, if not verbatim:

"We understand the Americans have orders to withdraw. I come to say that we (the Germans) will be glad to purchase from you any means of transportation, tentage, forage, subsistence stores, or any munitions or supplies suitable to our use. The price is not a matter of consideration. Our staff has apparently completely broken down, and we are destitute."

The disposition of stores was taken under advisement, and finally it was determined that while the American forces were being largely reduced the situation was such that it was impossible to fix the period of occupation, and practically all the stores were retained in China for the use of American troops, and the matter was not even presented to the Department in Washington.

As visual evidence of the conditions that existed in the German forces at that time, it was noted that German soldiers were walking about Tientsin in uniforms of thinnest khaki of a particularly unsuitable pattern and wearing straw hats until the temperature was so low that icicles were freezing on the eaves of the houses. In this garb these same German soldiers were daily harnessed to carts and Chinese wheelbarrows, drawing water for the consumption of their commands through the streets in discarded American tin cracker boxes and kerosene-oil cans. At the same time the American soldiers, if not in houses, were in tents warmed with stoves, dressed in good heavy woolen clothing and furs, with distilled water delivered to them in Studebaker water wagons!

When the German headquarters finally concluded to move to Peking, the field marshal made the journey from Tientsin to Peking in transportation furnished by the American army, and when he established his headquarters at Peking, it was in houses warmed by American stoves and lighted by American lamps filled with American kerosene, all of which was procured from the American Quartermaster's Department.

After the railroad had been restored and running a short while there was a wreck, which covered the track with freight cars. Chinese methods to clear it away failed. At last the Chinaman had found something that he couldn't lift on his back. No one knew what was to be done. There was too little transportation to burn the cars and sweep away the ashes. Some one said, "Get some jackscrews." None could be found. Finally it occurred to the railway manager to ask the Americans if they had any. There were on hand fifty or sixty that had been sent out not for any particular purpose, but simply because the American Quartermaster's Department knew that situations arise in campaigns where jackscrews might be very convenient, and they had provided them. So it was with almost everything during the entire winter. The American Quartermaster's Department and the American Subsistence Department, the two great supply departments of the Army, were the object of wonder on the part of all foreign officers who visited them, and without the splendid supplies there to be had the foreign armies would have lacked many dainties and a good many of the essentials which the Americans, in their kindness and abundance, permitted them to share.

This was occurring just about the time of agitation against the American army staff system, which resulted in the change to the present detailed system. Had the conditions above described been known and understood, it is doubtful if any change in a system which showed such superiority ever would have been abandoned.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that that is a pretty fair illustration of what trained officers, who have spent the larger part of their official lives in studying the needs of the particular department they are administering, can do. It does not make a bad showing for the American staff under the old régime in comparison with a European staff under the modern organization.

Of course, nobody wants to go back to the old cast-iron staff business, but I want to make this prophecy here to-day, that inside of the next few years this Government will have a modified detailed staff, that will train the younger officers in the line for the staff service; and when a man shows exceptional ability as a quartermaster, as a commissary, or any special staff duty, he will be made a permanent fixture in the staff when he reaches a grade not higher than that of lieutenant-colonel; in Quartermaster and Commissary departments not higher than grade of major. I think that is bound to come. We have an anomaly in our staff corps to-day in another thing. The President is not limited in selecting the head of a staff corps to any particular rank. He can take a first lieutenant and put him at the head of any staff corps, and I do not know that it would be proper to try to limit that power; but you have this anomaly. He is detailed there for four years. Suppose that at the end of four years another President comes in, and he does not want him. The officer who has been serving is a captain. There are several of them who are captains.

The President does not want this captain to continue, and he details a colonel at the head of that particular staff corps. What is going to become of that captain? The law provides that when he retires he shall retire with the grade of a brigadier-general, but he can not retire short of thirty years of service, unless a board is convened and declares that he is not physically or mentally capable of continuing in the service. He can not be arbitrarily retired until he is at least 62 years of age. He is compelled to retire at 64, of course; but suppose that at 40 years of age he goes out of one of the staff corps as chief of the corps, and the incoming President will not redetail him. What are you going to do with him? You have got to change your law for his retirement, or else he is suspended in the air for the Lord knows how many months or years, before he reaches the age when he could be retired. There is no place for him to go. He might be a supernumerary captain, for it was not the intention of Congress to provide for his promotion except on the lineal list, and he would hold his place on the lineal list; but his place as captain was filled when appointed chief of his corps, under the theory of the Department that they would detail an officer of same rank for the head of the corps to fill his place, and then he would get his rank back again, in lineal list, when his time as chief expired. But it does not work out that way. This provision was put in in another branch of Congress at the earnest solicitation of the War Department, and was finally agreed to by the House committee in conference. I think we made a mistake that we frequently do, by yielding so much in these controversies. It is better to stand by what you believe even if the bill fail.

Now, I have taken more time than I intended to. Debate under the five-minute rule will allow me to call attention to other measures embodied in the bill. Now, I want to say that there is a constant criticism of the enormous cost of the military establishment, and there has been a disposition at times to compare the cost of the military establishment now to what it was before the Spanish war. There is an enormous increase in the cost of the military establishment, a larger increase than the mere increase of men, because it is a larger increase of munitions of war. It is a larger increase in the transportation and the cost of training than it ever was before. It has been the same pay so far as the enlisted force is concerned, but the increase has come because of the larger field of the operations the Government has entered upon. Simply the increased pay of officers and enlisted men will not account for the large increase of the military establishment.

The Spanish war has been referred to often as being so enormously expensive, and they say that the nation can never be repaid for the treasure it has poured out as a result of that war. It freed Cuba, and has added enormously to the domain of the United States, whether we want it to remain ours permanently or not. I want to say to the gentlemen of this committee that no matter what has been our expense as a result of that war, all has been more than repaid to the country in the increased good feeling that has come over every section of our land. [Applause.] We are at last a united people. Up to the time the war broke out it was a question whether there was the same loyalty in one section as in the other; but when the flag was raised, and the President called for troops, boys whose fathers served under the stars and bars enlisted with the same enthusiasm as boys whose fathers served under the Starry Banner of the Republic. [Applause.]

And when that great and good President, Mr. McKinley [applause], anxious to see wiped out the last vestige of sectionalism, sent the names of four men to the Senate of the United States to become major-generals, two of them were men who wore the gray and two were men who wore the blue, and the last line of demarcation in this country was wiped out, and I hope and trust in God it will remain wiped out forever. [Applause.]

We are one nation to-day, North, South, East, and West, and the richest and strongest nation in the world. I have no fears of any people on earth trying to humiliate us upon any field of battle, and if they will give us a little more time I am not afraid of any people on earth trying to humiliate us on any ocean in any part of the world. [Applause.]

This country of eighty millions of freemen, who have given demonstration of heroic valor in fighting each other, will not be called upon, in my judgment, to demonstrate its valor in fighting any foreign foe. But if it should come the Spanish war demonstrated that the young men of to-day are as patriotic and as brave and as loyal to the flag as were their fathers. In all wars that may come we can look forward to the future of the Republic with the certainty that, no matter what may come to this country as a menace or danger, the patriotism and loyalty of its people will see that not a star is erased nor a stripe polluted of the glorious banner of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield for a question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. PARSONS. In striking out the million dollars for maneuvers, do you still leave in anything that will allow general instruction in coast defense?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I should say not, unless it can be paid out of the regular appropriations. The whole sum was used last year for coast defense. The argument this year was that it was for the entire camps for five or six points of the militia national guard. I would say that if there is a small appropriation necessary in order to enable the coast defense to be carried on, I would give it every year if necessary.

Mr. PARSONS. How much would it need?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I have no data on that. If the million was intended to cover maneuvers and the coast defense, it would not cost much. They have arranged for five great camps of concentration in different parts of the country, and they have notified each State that it can send one regiment. They may not have notified all of the States.

My State, I think, has been notified that it can send one. I have had letters from the gentleman from Connecticut and from other gentlemen from the East saying that one regiment of each State could go. At the hearing the question was asked of General Oliver:

How many camps will there be?

He answered:

Six or seven. It is proposed to have two on the Pacific, one on the northeastern coast, one in the south, one at Indianapolis, one at Fort Riley, one at Fort Sam Houston.

There is nothing said in this about a single cent for coast defenses or for the reserve militia for Coast Artillery.

Mr. PARSONS. Does the committee intend that there shall be no maneuver of any kind, either in the interior or as to the coast defenses?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No grand maneuvers. The committee considered the question. Let us take, for instance, the gentleman's own State. All of your militia come together, do they not, each year?

Mr. PARSONS. They do not all come in one year. Part of them do.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. How many regiments come this year?

Mr. PARSONS. I think half.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. How many are there?

Mr. PARSONS. I think we have fifteen.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Seven regiments, then, come together—

two brigades, practically. I would like to submit to the gentleman this proposition, that when those two brigades get together the Government can, out of this appropriation, order infantry and cavalry and artillery, and a detachment of the Signal Corps, to go to the State encampment and cooperate in these maneuvers, so that this will bring the Regulars and all the regiments of the militia together without costing the Government much, if anything, certainly nothing except the transportation of the Regulars, and does the gentleman not think that his militia will have infinitely more benefit than if one or two regiments only could be sent to a great camp of concentration, where a large part of the time is expended in traveling to the camp and returning to their homes?

Mr. PARSONS. I understand that under this bill that could be done?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, yes; that could be done, so far as the Regulars are concerned; and I will say to the gentleman that last year that is exactly what was done in my own State. We had all of our militia out for two weeks. We had sent from the Regulars cavalry, infantry, artillery, and a company of the Signal Corps, and all went into the operations, divided into two brigades, two opposing armies. The regular officers were there to umpire the game, to instruct in the maneuvers, where they required it, and our entire militia received the benefit of two weeks of active drill, mock battle, and campaign, where, if we had had a grand maneuver, only one regiment would have had that benefit.

Mr. PARSONS. Can we have joint instruction in coast defense this year without any additional appropriation?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The gentleman means for the interior defense?

Mr. PARSONS. No; for the coast defense.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; I should say that if it was intended to assemble the militia for coast defense, or the militia reserve for coast defense, it would be necessary to have some amendment providing specifically for that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. On that point, in the State of New York there have been organized, or changed, some infantry regiments into heavy artillery regiments. Last year one at least of these regiments was taken into the coast-defense batteries. I am informed that the Regulars acted as instructors of the militia. May not that be done under any appropriation carried in this bill?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I do not see how the militia could be paid out of this bill. The Regulars could give the instructions and all expenses of the Regulars; but, as I said to the gentleman's colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS], if it is desired, I certainly would not in any way hamper the fullest instruction of the coast artillery reserves.

I think it is the most important phase of our reserve defense, and while I am not fearful of immediate invasion on the Atlantic coast or on the Pacific coast, yet I believe that because of the fact that it requires special training to know how to handle these great engines of war, we ought to keep our militia in that line well trained. But as to the general grand maneuvers, I regard that the militia are benefited more by their camps of instruction where they are all regiments together in the State, having the Regulars combine with them, and then once in three years have a grand maneuver of all the militia and all the Regulars that are in the country, not so much to give instruction to the men as to give instruction to the officers, and nine-tenths of this instruction they talk about is simply for the general officers.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Is there enough existing law, so that if United States troops came to Peekskill, in our State, and joined with our State militia, the United States troops, for instance, could take orders from a State officer or our State troops could take orders from the United States officer?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think where the militia is brought in contact with the Regulars the Regulars have command; but I am not absolutely positive in this.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Is that a matter of statute or practice?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think it is statute. In regard to volunteers in the Army the highest in rank commands.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I understood the gentleman to say specifically, under the appropriations as they are reported in the bill, in our State if we got our 14,000 militia together and invited a United States Army man to come there to that encampment there is no money provided under this bill, and properly provided, so those expenses could be paid?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. For the regular force, yes; but I will say to the gentleman further than that, that the United States Government, on the request of your State to do so, would send officers to advise and supervise maneuvers and give the benefit of their instruction in the field, but the problems would be worked out by the militia officers themselves. And it is better for all that this should be so.

Mr. BENNET of New York. But this item for the encampment of the militia does not embrace anything but an appropriation of $1,000,000; it embraces no change in the law in that regard.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It is a general appropriation only. I will now yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PARSONS. I will ask the gentleman if that carries out the recommendations made by General Bell and the Assistant Secretary of War in their testimony before the committee in regard to maneuvers and joint instructions in coast defense?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; we do not, and we did not carry out their recommendations in several other matters. I want to say to my friend, I wish he would serve on the Committee on Military Affairs some time and see how many suggestions it is possible for a fertile mind to make that is hardly feasible for Congress to adopt. Now, Mr. Chairman, before closing, I have here an opinion from the Judge-Advocate-General that I secured last fall when an immense amount of discussion was going on as to the power of the President to retire officers on account of these so-called staff rides. I asked for the information and it was graciously sent me. It was considered personal at first, but by permission of the Judge-Advocate-General I ask unanimous consent that it may be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks so that we may all have the benefit of it. I regard it as an exceedingly valuable publication.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE-ADVOCATE-GENERAL,
Washington, November 22, 1907.

Before entering upon a discussion of the question suggested by the Acting Secretary of War, it will be proper to make a brief reference to the existing laws upon the subject of retirement.

History of retirement laws.—Prior to 1861 there was no requirement of statute which enabled the President, save by dismissal from the military service, to divest an officer of the functions of an office which he was physically unable to execute. He may have been disabled for performing his duty by age, wounds, or sickness, and this disability may have reached such a stage as to completely incapacitate him for the performance of any military duty, but, as the law stood, no relief could be afforded by Executive action.

In the summer of 1861 the matter was made the subject of legislative regulation as an enactment which received Executive approval on August 3 of that year, and which authorized the retirement from active service of officers of the Army and the Marine Corps. In a subsequent section of the same statute the retirement of officers of the Navy was provided for.

The act of 1861 provided that—

"If any commissioned officer of the Army or of the Marine Corps shall have become or shall hereafter become incapable of performing the duties of his office, he shall be placed upon the retired list and withdrawn from active service and command and from the line of promotion, with the following pay and emoluments." (Sec. 16, act of August 3, 1861; 12 Stat. L., 289.)

The act further provided that the extent and character of the disability should be determined by a retiring board, convened for that purpose by the Secretary of War, with the approval of the President, and it was made the duty of the board to "determine the facts touching the nature and occasion of the disability of any officer who appears to be incapable of performing the duties of his office." (Sec. 17, ibid.) If the board found an officer incapacitated for active service it was required to report "Whether in its judgment the said incapacity result from long and faithful service, from wounds or injuries received in the line of duty, from sickness or exposure therein, or from any other incident of service." (Ibid.)

If the conclusion was reached that the disability of the officer was due to any one of the causes above cited, the law provided that—

"If the President approves such judgment, the disabled officer shall thereupon be placed upon the list of retired officers, according to the provisions of this act. If otherwise, and if the President concur in opinion with the board, the officer shall be retired as above, either with his pay proper alone, or with his service rations alone, at the discretion of the President, or he shall be wholly retired from the service, with one year's pay and allowances; and in this last case his name shall be thenceforward omitted from the Army Register, or Navy Register, as the case may be." (Sec. 17, ibid.)

The foregoing requirements were embodied, with some slight modifications, in the revision of the laws in 1878, as sections 1243 to 1258 of the Revised Statutes.

It is proper to observe that, although the retirement of officers of the Army and Navy was provided for in the same enactment, the nature of the disabling cause is not the same in both cases. It has been repeatedly held by the Secretary of War that the "cause" of the "incapacity" contemplated in the act of August 3, 1861, and section 1249 of the Revised Statutes, must be a physical one; that moral obliquity was not had in view, and that an inquiry into an officer's general efficiency would be pertinent only in so far as it could be regarded as going to show that his inefficiency, if found, was the result of an impairment of health. (Paragraphs 2203, 2204, Digest Opinion, Judge-Advocate-General.)

The language used in the clause descriptive of incapacity in the Navy is considerably broader and provides that—

"Whenever any officer of the Navy, on being ordered to perform the duties proper to his commission, shall report himself unable to comply with such order, or whenever in the judgment of the President of the United States an officer of the Navy shall be in any way incapacitated for performing the duties of his office, the President at his discretion shall direct the Secretary of the Navy to refer the case of such officer to a board," etc.

Elsewhere it is provided that, "If such disability or incompetency proceeded from other cause, and the President concur in the opinion of the board, the officer may be retired," etc.

In the legislation above referred to no mention is made as to the manner in which the attention of the Secretary of War may be drawn to the case of an officer as to whose capacity for active service a doubt has arisen. It may be discovered in the ordinary performance of the officer's duty; it may result from the report of an inspector, or may be made the subject of representation by a department commander who is required to—

"assure himself by personal examination and observation that all officers and men under his control are efficient in the performance of duty; that the troops are thoroughly drilled and instructed in their field duties and tactical exercises; that supplies are properly distributed; that proper care is exercised in the purchase and preservation of public property, and that strict economy is exercised in all public expenditures. In his annual report the results of these inspections will be summarized. From time to time he will report, for the information of the War Department, the names of any and all officers belonging to his command who are believed to be permanently incapable, from any cause, of performing the duties of their several grades, both in garrison and in active service. He will also report any errors, irregularities, or abuses requiring the action of higher authority." (Army Regulations of 1904, par. 191.)

Meaning of the term "active service."—In the cases which have recently been ordered before retiring boards, the fact that the officers have been excused from riding, upon the reports of medical officers, or have been found unable to take or complete the test in that regard prescribed by the President, has rendered it necessary, in the opinion of the Department, that their physical condition should be made the subject of examination by a legally constituted tribunal. As a result of such examination the boards are required by law to ascertain the nature, extent, and cause of any disability which may be found to exist, and to determine whether it is sufficient in amount to incapacitate the officer for "active service." In that view of the case it becomes important to determine what is meant by the term "active service" as used in the statutes regulating the retirement of commissioned officers.

Prior to August 3, 1861, the date of the original retirement law, the term "military officers" was applied to the incumbents of military office, and a person who had been duly appointed to office in the Army was such an incumbent; to distinguish them from officers in the naval or civil service officers of the Army were said to be the military service, and no other status was recognized in the military establishment save that which attached, as above indicated, to the incumbency of military office. So long as there was but a single status which an officer of the Army could occupy such an incumbent could be described indifferently as being in the military service or in active service, and both terms had precisely the same meaning.

With the enactment of the retirement legislation of 1861, however, a new status was created, and it became possible for an officer to occupy a status differing materially from that theretofore occupied by him; so that since August 3, 1861, all officers who, in the operation of that enactment, have been found incapacitated for the performance of military duty by reason of age, wounds, or disability have been designated as "retired officers," or as "officers on the retired list," or as "officers retired from active service." But officers of the Army generally underwent no change of status in consequence of the enactment of the retirement law, but remained in the position which they occupied prior to its passage. To distinguish their cases from those of officers who by retirement had been divested of their former offices in the Army they were thereafter described as being in "active service" or on the "active list."

It would thus appear that, in the operation of the legislation above cited, officers at retirement undergo an important change of status, in that they are divested of the offices formerly held by them in the military establishment. Officers not retired, however, continue in the exercise of the functions of military office and, to distinguish the two classes, are said to be in "active service," or on the "active list."

The term "active service" is thus seen to be a legal one, and, as used in the statutes governing the procedure of retiring boards, merely relates to the efficient performance of the duties with which an officer is charged by law, regulations, or the custom of service in the branch of the line or department of the staff in which he holds military office. It has no relation to service in war or peace, or to physical or mental activity, unless such activity is so impaired by wounds, injury, or disease as to have reached a disabling stage. The term simply relates to that period in the career of an officer which intervenes between his appointment to military office and his vacation of such office due to death, resignation, dismissal, or retirement. During this period all officers are presumed to be physically and mentally capable of performing the duties of the offices into which they have been lawfully inducted. If the contrary appears, the law vests authority in the Secretary of War to convene a retiring board and to charge it with an inquiry into the nature and extent of the disability, with a view to ascertain whether the officer is incapacitated for performing the duties of his office.

The active service which an officer is expected and required to perform at all times is determined in part by the legal incidents of his office, in part by the nature and character of the duties performed in the branch of the establishment in which he exercises the functions of military office, and in part by his rank, ability, and experience in the military service. It will thus appear that the various employments upon which officers may be engaged and which constitute "active service" within the meaning of the retirement laws, differ materially in the case of officers in the several branches of the line and departments of the staff. The duties required by law of a colonel of cavalry or of light artillery, for example, are very different from those required of a colonel in the Judge-Advocate-General's Department or a colonel of engineers or ordnance. The duties of a colonel of infantry differ in some essential respects from those assigned to a colonel of Coast Artillery, and quite materially from those which are expected to be performed by a professor at the Military Academy having the assimilated rank of colonel.

The duties of a colonel of cavalry or light artillery, for example, require that the officer charged with their performance shall be able at all times, up to the date of his retirement, to appear mounted while engaged in the duty of drilling and instructing his command, or while exercising the functions of commanding officer of a mounted organization. The duties of an officer of the Judge-Advocate-General's or Medical Department, on the other hand, are largely sedentary and administrative in character, consisting for the most part in office work, in the supervision of hospitals, etc. While such an officer must always hold himself in readiness for a change to field work, riding is not an essential ingredient of the duties which officers of those departments are habitually expected to perform.

In the event of war the law provides that the representatives of the several departments on the staff of a corps commander shall have the rank of lieutenant-colonel, but there is no statute which prescribes the rank of the principal staff officers of a separate army; so that it is only in the event of an extraordinary emergency that officers of the grade of colonel in the departments named would be required to take the field or to do duty which required them to execute marches or perform other forms of mounted duty.

That staff officers above the grade of lieutenant-colonel will receive assignments as the principal staff officers at the headquarters of separate armies in the field in time of war is, in view of the experience gained in that regard during the civil war, extremely improbable. The adjutant-general of the armies operating against Richmond, under the immediate command of Lieutenant-General Grant, was Seth Williams, a lieutenant-colonel; the chief quartermaster and chief commissary were Ingalls and Clark, who were majors. The adjutant-general of the Army of the Potomac was Ruggles, a major; the chief quartermaster was Batchelder, a lieutenant-colonel of volunteers; the chief commissary was Wilson, a captain; the chiefs of engineers were Barnard, a lieutenant-colonel, and Duane, a major; the chiefs of artillery were Barry and Hunt, both lieutenant-colonels. The adjutant-general of the Army of the Cumberland was Whipple, a major; the chief engineers were Michler and Merrill, who were captains.

The colonels, and for the most part the lieutenant-colonels, of the supply departments were employed during that period in the War Department, or at the great arsenals and depots where the supplies were procured or manufactured, and from which they were distributed to the armies in the field. These officers are similarly employed in time of peace, or are serving on the General Staff, as assistants to the heads of Bureaus in the War Department, or as the chiefs of their respective branches of the staff at the headquarters of Territorial divisions and departments.

In some staff departments certain duties of a professional or technical character are vested by law, to which in the ordinary course of administration the higher grades of officers are habitually assigned. Colonels of engineers, for example, are subject to employment as members of certain commissions which are established by law, or they are charged with the preparation and execution of projects of river and harbor improvement, which are of great importance and require in their execution large sums of public money. The senior officers of ordnance are habitually employed as commanding officers of armories and arsenals; and officers of both classes would, from the nature of the services in which they are engaged, continue to be so employed in time of war. Indeed, save on the happening of an emergency which has not yet occurred in the military service, it would be essential to the best administration of the military establishment that the officers in charge of certain public works and of certain armories and arsenals and depots of supply should continue in those posts of duty during the existence of the emergency, and their separation from their posts would seriously hamper the heads of bureaus in the administration of the department under their control.

But the considerations which are to be given weight in this regard are not entirely historical. In 1889 Capt. Oscar Elting, of the Third Cavalry, was brought before a retiring board with a view to determine his liability to retirement. The investigation was directed to three causes of disability:

1. Hemorrhoids.
2. Age.
3. General inefficiency.

The acting Judge-Advocate-General, in his report, says as to the investigation respecting Captain Elting's inefficiency:

"Upon this point I would remark that the investigation into this officer's general efficiency seems to be pertinent only in so far as it can be regarded as going to show that his inefficiency, if there be any, is the result of an impairment of health incident to the service—thus connecting effect with cause. The evidence upon the question of his efficiency is contradictory, but assuming that it does show that he has not been an efficient officer, it does not, in my opinion, connect his inefficiency with an existing physical disability."

As to Captain Elting's age, with its attendant impairment of vigor, Doctor Bailey, a medical member of the board, testified as follows:

"Q. (By the Board.) Do you think he could stand a cavalry campaign?—A. I don't think he could, as I understand a cavalry campaign. Not many men of his age could.

"Q. (By the Board.) Could he stand a cavalry campaign as well as most men of his age?—A. I do not think so; I think he is below the average in physique and capacity to perform duty.

"Q. (By Captain Elting.) Is he physically able to perform the duties of a cavalry officer in the present requirements of the service?—A. Yes: in the everyday requirements of the service at this time. But in the emergencies of the service, which are liable to arise at any moment, he could not."

Now, were this the only evidence of disability it could not, I think, be held to exist, so as to take the case out of the operation of the law regulating retirement for age.

As to hemorrhoids, the report goes on to say:

"In April and May of this year Captain Elting was under the treatment (for hemorrhoids) of Doctor Pope (p. 10 et seq.). Doctor Pope performed certain surgical operations, after which (p. 13) he considered Captain Elting fit for all duty which could be required of a cavalry officer. He knew of no reason why he should not be, his health in other respects being excellent, taking into consideration his age.

"The medical officers of the retiring board reported under date of July 13, 1899 (Exhibit H), that they found Captain Elting suffering from slight external hemorrhoids, and that there were evidences of recent operations performed to extirpate others, the remains of which were still visible, and that he also had hypermetropia in a moderate degree.

"Doctor Pope further testified (p. 75):

"'Q. (By recorder.) Is it not a fact in your experience that when an officer of Captain Elting's age and physical condition has had ulcerated hemorrhoids for a number of years, that they are liable to return on his being subjected to a long and hard campaign in inclement weather?—A. I have not had sufficient experience in observing old cases of hemorrhoids that have been apparently cured to answer the question definitely, but I would expect a return of the disease in a person of the Captain's years if he were exposed to prolonged and severe hardship—field service.'

"So that the evidence of disability may be regarded as reduced to this: The existence on the 13th of July of 'slight external hemorrhoids,' and the liability of a return of ulcerated hemorrhoids when a person of Captain Elting's age having had them for a number of years is exposed to 'prolonged and severe hardship—field service.'"

It appears that the board erred in failing to report whether the causes of disability which it found to exist in Captain Elting's case were or were not an incident of service; but this was immaterial, and the acting judge-advocate concluded that:

"Independently of this, I am of opinion that the law contemplates an existing and not a purely prospective and contingent incapacity, and I am further of opinion that the evidence fails to establish the incapacity which the law has in view."

Having regard to the slow and gradual change in respect to standards of physical efficiency which have marked the findings of retiring boards since 1889, it may well be doubted whether an officer in Captain Elting's physical condition would not be permitted to remain on the active list. But this is not material, as the substance of the opinion was that the incapacity upon which the board based its findings must be existing, not prospective or contingent in character.

Having regard to what has been said, the following résumé is submitted as to the functions with which the President is charged by law as the reviewing officer of the proceedings of retiring boards.

1. The duty vested in the retiring board and the President is judicial in character; the board examines the officer, investigates his military record, receives testimony, hears arguments, and, upon a full showing of the facts, reaches a finding as to the nature, extent, and cause of the disability in a particular case. The written record of its proceedings is laid before the Secretary of War, who thus has before him the case that was submitted to the board. If, upon a full examination of all the evidence, he concurs in the conclusions reached, he approves the action of the board and converts what was in the nature of a mere recommendation into a legal and valid finding.

"The finding of a retiring board, approved by the President, is conclusive as to the facts. The board finds the facts and the President approves or disapproves the finding, but the law does not empower him to modify the finding or to substitute a different one. There is here a judicial power, vested in the two, and not in the President acting singly, and when the power has been once fully exercised it is exhausted as to the case." (Dig. Opins. J. A. G., par. 2206.)

In Burchard's case it was held by the Supreme Court that—

"The law requires a record of the proceedings and decision of the retiring board to be made and transmitted to the Secretary of the Navy and by him laid before the President for his approval or disapproval or orders in the case. At first the findings in this case were approved and orders made thereon, but afterwards the Department became satisfied on reexamination that the findings were wrong and that the incapacity was actually the result of causes incident to the service. Neither the Department nor the President could then change the findings, as they had already been approved and were no longer open to review. The action of the President was equivalent to the judgment of an appropriate tribunal upon the facts as found." (Burchard v. United States, 125 U. S., 176–179.)

If the President dissents from the action of the board in any particular—that is, if he regards the investigation as incomplete or defective in any material respect, or if the conclusions or findings of fact reached by the board are erroneous or not warranted by the testimony, or if there is no specific finding that the cause of disability is or is not an "incident of service," he disapproves the proceedings or findings, or both, and thus terminates the investigation.

If the work of the board is defective or incomplete, the analogy in procedure to that of a court-martial would justify, and in some cases suggest, a return of the record to the board for the purpose of having the defect corrected, at the same time furnishing it with the grounds of his opinion. The board may err, as did that in Captain Elting's case, and base its conclusion upon some prospective and contingent incapacity, rather than upon the ability of the officer to render the specific active service which is required of an officer of his grade by law, regulations, or the custom of service. The medical examination may not have been so thorough as to convince the President that the disability which is found to exist constitutes in fact a permanent incapacity. A reasonable prospect of recovery, especially where the disability is due to diseases incurred in tropical service, should never be omitted from consideration in any finding as to the "permanent incapacity" of an officer of the Army.

2. In determining incapacity due to age, the fact should not be lost sight of that age, as a disabling cause, has been made the subject of legislative regulation. Unless there be some active physical infirmity in a particular case, in the operation of which one officer is as much incapacitated at 54 as the average officer is at 64, decisive weight should be attached to the determination in that regard which has been reached by Congress upon full consideration of the facts.

3. It is proper to note that the operation of the original retirement law was substantially automatic, and provided that when a proper and sufficient finding of incapacity had been reached, the officer "shall be retired from active service and placed on the list of retired officers." (Sec. 1251, Rev. Stats.) Since the creation of the limited retired list all officers who reach the statutory age, together with those who fail to pass the physical examination for promotion and those who voluntarily apply for retirement after forty years' service, pass directly to the unlimited list as do those who, having been retired on their own application after thirty years' service or in the discretion of the President after reaching 62 years of age, reach the age of 64 years. It would thus be possible, but hardly probable, that an officer whose incapacity has been established by the findings of a retiring board might find no vacancy awaiting him on the limited list when the findings of the board in his case had received the approval of the President. But as the state of the limited list is known to the Department at all times, the case could hardly occur in which a board would be convened for the examination of an officer without a vacancy existing to which, in the event of his retirement, he could be assigned. For this reason it is believed that the sections of the Revised Statutes which govern in matters of retirement have not lost their automatic quality in the operation of the amendatory legislation of the past twenty-five years.

Very respectfully.

GEO. B. DAVIS,
Judge-Advocate-General.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. PARSONS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2210. An act to increase the salary of the United States district judge for Porto Rico.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the following title:

H. R. 6515. An act for the relief of J. A. Gallaher, administrator of the estate of Joseph H. Gallaher, deceased.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 902) authorizing certain extensions to be made of the lines of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company, the Washington Railway and Electric Company, the City and Suburban Railway of Washington, and the Capital Traction Company, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. LONG, and Mr. MARTIN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the beautiful tribute paid to the country and to all sections of it by my distinguished friend from Iowa in the closing part of his remarks. I have heard these beautiful tributes to what some people unexpectedly found to be the loyal condition of the minds and hearts of the people of the South in 1898. I have heard them around the festive board, as orators say, when noble and generous sentiments were more or less inspired by the rich wines of France and Spain, and bursting forth on Monday morning, as this does, and without any special provocation I was able to discover, makes me suspect that my friend had still lingering with him the memory of a good dinner on Saturday night and its generous sentiments. I could not believe, of course, that he would have done such a thing as to commit a violent assault upon the Sabbath by indulging in a dinner of that sort on Sunday.

Mr. Chairman, speaking seriously, I want to protest in the name of every citizen of my section against the suggestion that the South was not loyal to the Union prior to this little episode known to history as the Spanish-American war. There has been no time since 1870 when, if we were not being treated as stepchildren, the people of the South were not prepared to rally to the flag and defend its honor and, if necessary, to lay down their lives in the defense of the integrity of the country. And I think that before I get through with you I will be able to prove by some figures I shall submit that we have even gone a step further in the process of reconstruction—that we are not only now absolutely loyal and ready to defend the country, but that, like a great many others of our fellow-countrymen, we have our eyes fixed on the pay rolls and the pension lists. But before doing so, Mr. Chairman, I want to invite the attention of the committee for just a moment to the statement of the United States Treasurer, issued on the 21st day of February of this year, the last of these statements that has reached me.

It shows that upon that date, or up to and including that date, the expenditures had exceeded the receipts for the current fiscal year by $25,119,756.09, and that upon that day the expenses were in excess of the receipts by $953,347.49. Now, this statement of the 21st of February is very like many others that have reached Members within the last three months. It has shown an unfavorable daily balance. It has shown a state of affairs that if it prevailed in any business house on earth would indicate that that commercial establishment was going at a breakneck pace toward the bankruptcy court.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELL. Would the gentleman from Texas also place right in that connection the figures at the bottom of the first page of that daily report, showing the available cash balance on that date?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes, Mr. Chairman. I have no doubt that we had a large cash balance upon that day, and that we have also got an enormous reserve capital in the resources of the people, but I am speaking now of the current business of the country. I am endeavoring to show, and I can establish it, I think, by the documents issued by the Government itself, that the receipts are far behind the expenditures for the current fiscal year.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again right there?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELL. I would like to call attention to the vast difference, right at this point, that there is between national and private financiering, and to ask the gentleman whether, with an available cash balance subject to draft of over $260,000,000, there is anything serious in a monthly deficit?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not anticipate the bankruptcy of the Government unless we go on indefinitely making expenditures exceed receipts, but it is as certainly true of the Government as it is of an individual, that if you keep on taking out of your money chest and fail to replace as much as you take out, you will ultimately find yourself with an empty chest. That is true.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, there is no proper parallel between a private business house and the great Government of the United States, which has all the vast wealth of the people to draw from for its necessities, which has systems of taxation that not only enrich thousands of private individuals, but also pile up an enormous surplus out of the people's savings in the Treasury. It is there. Everybody knows it.

Mr. BOUTELL. Right on that point, the distinction between private and public financiering, is there any way in which this $260,000,000 available cash balance can be reduced to a normal point, which, in my opinion, should not be over $50,000,000, except by allowing the expenditures to exceed the revenues? Or, in other words, by refraining from raising additional revenues until we have reached that point?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman may dismiss his apprehension. We are likely to reduce it to the normal point very soon, to his $50,000,000, let us say.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman read the excess of revenues over receipts for the corresponding day last year, for the information of the committee, where instead of being a deficit of $25,000,000 there was a surplus of about $36,000,000 or $37,000,000?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does the gentleman mean the fiscal receipts for that day or for the month?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman said that up to that time we had this year a deficit of $25,000,000. Will he now read the surplus of last year up to that day, which in my judgment was about $36,000,000 or $37,000,000.

Mr. SLAYDEN. On the corresponding date last year the receipts were $2,911,000, the expenditures $2,540,000, the difference being an excess of receipts over expenditures of $371,938.40. Is that what the gentleman wants?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I mean for the entire year.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And for the year, to the corresponding date, the receipts were $424,684,143.08, and the expenditures $387,787,450.22, being a difference in favor of the Government of $36,896,692.86.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the gentleman, the surplus for the entire fiscal year last year was about $85,000,000. That, of course, does not show on that statement. The only point, Mr. Chairman, with the gentleman's permission, I was trying to make, was that the use of that word "deficit" sometimes creates a misapprehension when discussing public finance. In other words, we could now run behind $50,000,000 a year for four years before there would be any of that misapprehension which would occur to a private business house.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, beyond all doubt a country so swollen as the United States can live on its own fat for several years.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They could not do that and apply the amount to the sinking fund under the law.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Now, Mr. Chairman, what I was about to ask is, Is there any particular law of business that will protect the Government and hold it harmless in practices that would mean disaster to the citizen? I have never heard of one, and despite the suggestions that have been made, I do not believe that one exists. The path of wisdom for the individual is undoubtedly in the matter of income and expenses, the same that should be pursued by the Government, and that is to live within your income.

In this connection I want to submit some figures to the Members of this House. They are so large and so important that I feel that they should command their attention and that of the country.

I do so because only a limited number of the Members of this body appear to realize the stupendous total of appropriations that have been asked of Congress by the heads of the various administrative Departments. Plus the extravagant demands of these Bureaus that we are in duty bound to examine are also certain private and special interests that are vociferous in their demands for large appropriations. If we were to yield to all these pretensions we would soon be forced to double all rates of taxation and in the end would bankrupt the Government and the people. We are now almost, if not quite, a $2,000,000,000 Congress, and permanently so, I fear. At the rate we are traveling we will soon have $2,000,000,000 sessions, or a $4,000,000,000 Congress. How long such a scale of extravagance can continue without bringing disaster to the country is more than I can tell.

There is only one way to correct this gross outrage, and that is to reduce expenses. It is plainly and urgently our duty as the representatives of the people and the guardians of their treasure to let none of these measures become law without the most critical inspection and the clearest warrant in justice, and for that reason I earnestly beg your attention to the facts I shall submit.

PENSIONS.

We have on the Calendar now and ready for consideration by the House of Representatives the annual pension appropriation bill. If enacted as reported from the committee, it will take out of the Treasury $150,869,000.

In the judgment of the Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Warner, the widows' bill that lately passed this House and is now pending in the Senate, and sure to be enacted, will require an additional appropriation of about $15,000,000 a year.

Add these items and you will find that we have an annual pension charge of $165,869,000, a remarkable total that may well make the richest nation in the world "sit up and take notice."

We have the most liberal pension laws of any nation on earth. I think I am safe in saying that we have the most liberal pension laws that any nation on earth ever had. We prodigally provide for every class in the country that can by any interpretation of history or stretch of the imagination be thought entitled to the gratitude of the Federal Government. Yet all of you know that both Pension Committees are fairly overflowing with private bills that provide for original pensions and for liberal increases for pensioners already on the rolls. You also know that the Calendar is choked with this personal legislation favorably reported from the committee, and that on certain Fridays in each month, under the presidency of our most expert, rapid-fire pension speaker, my highly esteemed friend from Rhode Island, these bills, being duly considered and perfectly understood by the Committee of the Whole, are reported to the House with the recommendation that they do pass, and they invariably do at the rate of two a minute. Under the parliamentary fiction we indulge in, they are read, considered, read a third time, voted on, and laid aside with a favorable recommendation at the rate of thirty seconds per bill.

That is not all. From Congress to Congress, in a continuous and everswelling chorus, we are urged to provide old-age pensions for civil employees in Washington who have been too improvident to look out for themselves. With each succeeding Congress it is harder to resist their appeal, and I do not doubt that in the end it will be yielded to. Then like the rings made by a stone dropped into a pool this civil-pension system will gradually spread until it will cover the entire country, for what is fair to the servants of the Government in Washington can not be decently denied to those in other places. And just think where it will land us. After a while, when we shall have Government ownership of railways, telegraphs, coal mines, waterworks, and bake shops, all among the necessities of modern life, and all vehemently urged by certain earnest men who have not thought out the consequences, we will have a condition that will make government of, for, and by pensioners not only possible but probable, for all these civil employees will finally have to go on the pension rolls.

Where, in God's name, it is all to end I can not even guess. Let us hope that if this madness can not be arrested it will soon complete the circle and develop to a stage where everybody will be on the rolls at the same liberal rate and the plane of equality reestablished.

ARMY PAY BILL.

The bill for the pay of the Army as reported carries an appropriation of $85,007,566.56.

The text of the bill provides that the pay of enlisted men shall be increased by about 35 per cent, but does not appropriate the money to meet the increase. It is estimated with approximate accuracy that the increased pay of the enlisted men will amount to $5,000,000. Thus, as you see, the total of this bill should be $90,007,566.56 instead of the sum that it appears to appropriate.

The Committee on Military Affairs of the House did not report an increase for the commissioned officers, for whose particular benefit the agitation for more pay was really started, and which, as things go, I am not prepared to say is an unreasonable demand. However, it is sure to be added somewhere under this roof, and that will mean at least $2,000,000 more.

What other increases will be made I am not prepared to say, but you may put it down as a fact that the Army bill will take as much as $92,000,000 out of the Treasury.

THE NAVAL BILL.

Although the naval appropriation bill has not yet been printed and so made available for the Members of the House, it is said to carry $103,967,518.43.

It provides for the construction of two battle ships that will cost $20,000,000, but fails to appropriate for them. It authorizes the purchase of eight submarine boats that will cost some millions, if they are not meantime sunk in a sea of scandal.

Mr. MANN. They ought to rise from that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. With additions to be made, it is quite certain that the naval budget this year will not be less than $125,000,000.

VOLUNTEER RETIRED LIST.

Pending, but not yet submitted, pressed by a lobby that appears to be resistless, and certain to emerge from the committee some day with a draft on the Treasury that will startle the country, is the volunteer officers' retirement bill.

That bill originally proposed to place certain volunteer officers of the civil war who reached the rank of general on the retired list of the Army, with the pay and emoluments of the rank they held at the time of discharge from the service.

It was suggested by officers of lower rank that they also, while not so distinguished, did creditable service to the Union and should not be discriminated against. They even hinted that there were more of them than there are of the officers of the higher rank, and you may be sure that their protest was heard and that they were taken into camp.

But there is another class, even more numerous, that had not been reckoned with. They were the enlisted men, who found ready champions in my friends, General SHERWOOD, of Ohio, Colonel BRADLEY, of New York, and others who reached high rank in that great war. These enlisted men, in person and through their friends, protested that on them had fallen the brunt of battle, the marches through mud, coarser fare, and greater hazard.

They insisted that they had fought as hard, were in as great danger, and served for less pay, and they even appeared to have the foolish notion that they could suffer the same pangs that officers do. They seemed to say with Shylock:

> Hath not a private eyes? Hath not a private hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions; fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer as a general is?

Arguments like that backed by such numbers are irresistible. As one Member significantly said in my presence, "There are more privates in my district than there are officers."

After working over the bill for months the committee found that it could not tell whether the cost of such legislation would be $25,000,000 a year, as put by one conservative man, or $65,000,000, as estimated by another.

It was generally thought by the committee that it would cost about $35,000,000 a year for men who had served in the field for eighteen months. Later, beyond all doubt, the men who served one year or six months, or even ninety days, would surely demand a similar benefaction, and who is there that can doubt that an organized pressure would fail to get it. This $35,000,000 is, I believe, the figure that the late President Garfield, while a Member of this House, fixed as the ultimate maximum annual cost of all probable pension legislation.

Now, it is worth while noticing, Mr. Chairman, in this connection—and some gentlemen near me say that I have the figures above those stated by Mr. Garfield—it is worth while noting that we are now appropriating in the pension bill a sum nearly five times as great as Mr. Garfield thought would ever be necessary to meet the maximum demands on account of pensions, and the end is not in sight.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas yield for a question?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE. As I understand the tenor of the gentleman's remarks, which have been very instructive to me, at least, his complaint is that these increases in the expenditures through the channels of pensions are a general evil; that is, that he regards the increase as an evil.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not think the gentleman could so understand me, for I did not say it. I have simply stated certain facts and leave the House to draw its own conclusions.

Mr. BURKE. Well, the gentleman's remarks would seem to discourage that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If a mere statement of the truth discourages them, perhaps so.

Mr. BURKE. My purpose was to inquire of the gentleman regarding the increases.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am stating the facts, letting the gentleman and the House draw their own conclusions from those facts. At the beginning of my remarks I observed that I would, without comment or expression of opinion, state certain facts. I do not object to saying to the gentleman, if he wants my personal opinion, that I do regard national extravagance as an evil and a great evil.

Mr. BURKE. The gentleman indicated that these increases that are now going on were intensified by the possibility of Government ownership of water and railroads.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I did not quite catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. BURKE. The gentleman has further indicated that these evils would be intensified when we come to acquiring title as a Government to the waterworks and the railroads of the country, which would to that extent increase and possibly make necessary a civil pension list. If that be so, I want to ask the gentleman what is his attitude toward the only gentleman in this country who has advocated the public ownership of railroads?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, out of courtesy to the gentleman nominated the other day on the floor of the House I take it that the nominations are closed. [Laughter.] I thought that the gentleman from Illinois had settled that matter, and I shall not discuss the matter my friend has in mind.

Mr. BOUTELL. It was unanimous in this House.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, these figures seem to disturb my friend from Pennsylvania so much that he would like to switch the discussion off to personalities and reopen the Presidential convention. I am not going to permit it to be done, but I am going to conclude my remarks by giving a brief summary of the figures I have submitted.

First, let me say that I am also informed that the Committee on Militia will bring in an increased appropriation bill. As to what amount I am not informed.

Mr. MANN. Not an appropriation bill?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Militia does not make an appropriation bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am also informed that this Committee on Militia had a proposition—formulated by the National Guard, for the purpose of being offered by the committee—which is intended to set up a bureau in the War Department, officered and directed by members of the National Guard, which would have been the entering wedge that would ultimately have led to an appropriation that no doubt would have gone up into scores of millions each year. And think what a plea the friends of the measure could make. How plausible would the argument be that the real defense of this country rested upon the National Guard—the volunteer soldiers!

How reasonable would the argument be, in view of the importance of the National Guard, that a paltry million or two appropriated for them, in comparison with the hundred or more millions appropriated for the Regular Army, was illogical and inadequate, and how effective would be an appeal to the friends of the militia? It would bring to the support of their measure the local influences from your district and from mine and from every district in this country. Once started upon that line of legislation, there is no telling where it would end or how much money it would take out of the Treasury. Now, let me give you—and I invite the particular attention of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE] to these figures—a summary, and I beg him to take it home with him and consider overnight and see if he does not agree with me that these are rather big sums of money to be taken from the taxpayers. There is the pension bill, $150,869,000; the widows' pension, estimated, $15,000,000; the Army pay bill, with an estimate of increases, $92,007,566.56, and naval bill, $103,967,518.43, with battle ships authorized in the bill, but not provided for by appropriation, $20,000,000; making a sum total of $381,844,084.49.

Now, let us add the volunteer retired officers' bill, and taking a low estimate of $25,000,000, which I think my friends who served with me on that committee will admit is rather below than above the mark, and we have a grand total of $406,844,084.49. Divide the first of these sums by the number of days in the year and you will find that the taxpayers of this country are now paying more than a million dollars a day for military purposes and for the consequences of war. No government on earth, not even the great military kingdoms of Europe, expend anything like as much for this purpose as we do. Then take this grand total of $406,844,084.49 and divide it in the same way, and you will find that it will cost over $1,100,000 a day to pay the military expenses of the Government. I ask my friends from the rural districts to consider what these figures mean. It will take 22,000 bales of cotton at 10 cents a pound to pay the daily military expenses of the country; it will take 8,000,000 bales a year at the same rate to pay them; and it will take 400,000,000 bushels of wheat at $1 a bushel to pay the annual military charges of the nation. Whether $1 is above or below the average value I am unable to say, but I have dimly floating in my mind an idea that it is a fair market price. I need not suggest to Members of this House that if they want their rivers and harbors improved, if they want their commerce developed, if they want public buildings in their districts, they should call a halt to this military extravagance. One will benefit your constituency, the other is a burden to them. One spells construction, the other destruction. One will add to the sum of human happiness, the other to its miseries. It is your opportunity and it is your duty to make a choice. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I now yield forty-five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. HAMILTON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it is with some little temerity that I rise to address the House at this time. Perhaps, being a new Member, it may be an assumption on my part to undertake to tell the older Members what sort of legislation we ought to enact, but when I consider the interests that the constituency which I represent have in the legislation that is being and ought to be considered by this House, I will certainly be excused for inflicting myself upon you for a brief time. We have during the general debate at this session heard considerable discussion with reference to the President's message, some criticising and some eulogizing. I may, perhaps, during the course of my remarks either criticise or eulogize the President of the United States. I shall agree with him where, in my judgment, he agrees with me. Some of the doctrines which he promulgates in his message, and especially the second message, are the doctrines that I have been taught from my boyhood, and understand to be the doctrines of genuine Democracy. There is no question but that at this time our country is in sore distress for some cause or other. Out in my part of this great country along last fall when the people were exceedingly prosperous, when the granaries were full and prices were good and the bank deposits were exceedingly large, they went to bed on Saturday night feeling happy and awakened Monday morning with the banks of my State, in many places, practically closed, and they were unable to withdraw their own money that they had deposited in them.

They at once asked the question, and the people of this country are asking the question to-day, What is wrong? Many remedies are suggested to relieve this condition of affairs. Among others we have been told upon the floor of this House, we have been told throughout the length and breadth of this country, that we are much in need of an elastic currency, of more currency, but when we contemplate the conditions that, in my judgment, brought about the panic which is now upon this country, we need less elasticity in the consciences of the high financiers of the country rather than elasticity in our currency. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Whether I am agreeing with the President or he with me, I contend that one of the first remedies that ought to be applied is that, so far as the National Government has the power, it ought to prevent stock gambling, watering of stock, and the illegitimate conditions which exist in the great money centers of this country that are withdrawing from the legitimate business of the country the money that ought to be engaged in taking care of the products of the land. I contend that if this sort of legislation were placed upon our statute books, so far as we have the power to place it there, and the doors of these institutions that are but little less than gambling houses were closed, the capital which seeks investment there would seek investment in the honest business enterprises of the country, and it is a question whether under such conditions we have not a sufficient amount of currency to carry on the legitimate business of the country. You can not prevent capital from seeking legitimate investment if you will close the doors of the houses of gambling and speculation.

Capital is greedy, and if there is an opportunity presented whereby it thinks it may obtain 100 per cent profit, it will pass by the legitimate enterprise where there is only a promise of 5 or 10 per cent profit and take its chances in the speculative or gambling institutions. But if you will close them, if it is possible for it to be done by national legislation, that capital which seeks investment in those institutions will at once seek investment in the legitimate enterprises of the country. I hope that the prophecy made by my colleague from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] upon the floor of the House a few days ago will come true and that before this session closes there will be measures brought upon the floor and passed by this House proceeding as far as possible to the protection of the people from the gambling and speculative institutions of the country. I contend that it is not paternalistic legislation; it is only legislation that throws a protection around the party who by his labor and his intelligence produces the wealth of the country. The industrious citizenship of the United States is not asking for any paternal legislation. The people are not asking for legislation that will put a dollar in their pocket that is not placed there by the production of their hands, because they know, as all of us know, that there is only one way of legislating a dollar in any man's pocket, and that is by legislating it out of another man's pocket. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

They are not asking for such legislation. They are only asking for such legislation as will protect the wealth of this country in the hands of the industrious and intelligent individual who produces it and prevents its being diverted from its legitimate channels by the so-called "captains of industry" of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I stand here as measure, whether it comes from that side of the Chamber or a Democrat, but it makes no difference to me who proposes the from this, I, as a Representative of my constituents, will heartily support measures that I believe will bring about this result. We have heard considerable upon the floor of this House, and all over the country, with reference to the power of the corporations, trusts, and combinations, and how they have imposed upon the rights of the people. Legislation has been proposed by the introduction of bills by Members on both sides of this Chamber looking toward the protection of the people from the impositions of these great trusts and combinations. The President of the United States has sent two messages to this Congress concerning some of these questions, and I desire now to read from the first message delivered to this House upon the question of tariff legislation. I read from his message as follows, speaking of the revision of the tariff:

> The question should be approached purely from a business standpoint, both the time and the manner of the change being such as to arouse the minimum of agitation and disturbance in the business world, and to give the least play for selfish and factional motives. The sole consideration should be that the sum total of changes represents the public good. This means that the subject can not with wisdom be dealt with in the year preceding a Presidential election, because, as a matter of fact, experience has conclusively shown that at such a time it is impossible to get men to treat it from the standpoint of the public good. In my judgment the wise time to deal with the matter is immediately after such election.

That is the statement from this message, and it is conceded by gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber that tariff reform is needed at this time. It is advised that we must revise the tariff, yet we are told that it is unwise to do so preceding a Presidential election. I call attention again to the second message of the President of the United States, which was sent to this House at a time when the financial conditions in this country were in a turmoil; sent to this House at a time, if there ever was a time, when men should be conservative and not attack the financial interests of the country, when these great financial institutions were trembling to the very foundation—the President of the United States sends a message to this House impressing upon us the importance of some legislation that he considers it necessary in order to prevent the "malefactors," as he terms them, from robbing the people.

I say here, whether it be a eulogy upon the President or not, when he wrote this last message to this House I believe he did right in calling our attention to the financial conditions of the country and in calling our attention to the dishonesty in some of the places of high finance. But the reason I have called your attention at this time to the two messages is to now say to you that if the President was right and logical when he wrote the last message, attacking some of the great business interests, and I contend he was, then it is utterly impossible for him to have been logical when he wrote the first message to Congress and said that we should not revise the tariff at this session. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There was much more reason for not sending the last message, upon the logic that he gives for putting off the revision of the tariff until after election in the first message. The tariff ought to be revised, and I believe we all publicly concede that it ought to be revised. I do not think there is any Member of this House upon either side of the Chamber who contends publicly that the tariff ought not to be revised. Even the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] a few days ago said to us upon the floor of this House that the next Republican platform would declare for a revision of the tariff. Why revise it? Revise it because under and by reason of the present schedules of the Dingley tariff law the corporations and trusts of this country are permitted to extort from the people more than they should of the production of honesty, industry, and intelligence, and, as long as it is only attacking them, why not revise it at this time? What business will it interfere with? No other business in the world except the business of robbing the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Then why put it off until after the Presidential election? Not only we upon this side of the Chamber are contending that by reason of the present schedules the people are being robbed annually, but I have here and will read to you from a newspaper clipping what a gentleman said who was in the city of Washington a few days ago trying to get a measure through this House for the appointment of a tariff commission, and I give you his figures. This gentleman was Mr. Van Cleave, president of the National Association of Manufacturers. He says:

From one-half to two-thirds of the stuff made under this tariff bears to the consumer an unjust and unreasonable price because of the tariff. It is estimated by competent authorities that the graft overcharge and wrong done the American public because of the present tariff reaches $3,000,000 a working day. We have the facts, schedule by schedule, and are prepared to make the details public should we receive opposition to our demand for a permanent tariff commission, through the appointment of which a proper adjustment of the tariff can be procured.

We are not agitators or reformers. We are mostly Republicans, and all protectionists.

If the statement made by this eminent gentleman is true, then by reason of the present duties of the Dingley tariff law the people of this country, the consumers, if you please—the common people who use the articles that are manufactured by these trusts and combinations and sold to them under trust and combination prices—are annually paying $900,000,000 more than they ought to pay. Why not revise that now? Why permit these trusts and corporations to have this $900,000,000 a year of the people's money until after the next Presidential election? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Yes, they tell us that there will be a plank in the Republican party platform for a revision of the tariff. It is not stated whether that revision will be up or whether it will be down. We do not know anything about it. There have been measures introduced upon the Republican side of this House at this session of Congress placing certain articles upon the free list, among them petroleum, wire, lumber, and so forth. We do not anticipate a report of any bills by the Ways and Means Committee that were introduced by Democrats, but if you will report out of the committee the bill introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN], putting petroleum on the free list, we will all vote for it. It is right. Why not do it?

The President, in his second message, refers to the Standard Oil Company as one of the great malefactors. We find that a fine of $29,000,000 was assessed against the Standard Oil Company, which has not been paid. But there is an opportunity for us, the representatives of the people, the servants of 80,000,000 people, to inflict a fine upon the Standard Oil Company which will amount to something and one which the manipulators of the Standard Oil trust can not by a simple twist of the wrist compel the people of the country to pay, and which we may do by placing petroleum upon the free list, as called for in the bill of the gentleman from Wisconsin. Why not do it? If we are after the Standard Oil Company, let us not content ourselves by fining them for violation of the laws of the land, but let us say to them, "You have violated the laws of this country; you have imposed upon the people, and we will take away from you the protection afforded you under the Dingley tariff law." Let us not be content with compelling them to pay a fine, but compel them to leave millions of dollars of money in the hands of the poor people who have to use their products. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Other measures have been introduced at this session looking toward tariff revision. No Member will arise upon the floor of this House and proclaim that some of the measures introduced by gentlemen upon that side of the Chamber are not just, the only contention being that they should be postponed until after the next election.

I ask that this House this session of this Congress pass some of these measures that will in some way show the good faith of the powers who control this House. I want some Members who think, as has been stated, that the convention which meets at Chicago is going to place in its platform a tariff-revision plank to do something to show the good faith of that plank. I want some earnest money. Pass some of these bills introduced by gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber in order that we may have something by which we can avoid the statute of fraud after the next Presidential election. [Applause.]

Let me say to my friends on the other side of the Chamber that you can not go before the people of this country at another election and rely upon the fact that you have introduced measures in this House tending to tariff revision under the conditions that now exist. It is true that you have introduced bills to place petroleum and other articles on the free list, and you can go back to your constituents and say to them: "Why, I introduced this measure. That shows we are in favor of tariff revision. The bill died in the committee; consequently we could not get it passed." But let me say to you, and say it in all candor, before a single one of these measures was introduced you had voluntarily and of your own will placed it absolutely beyond your power to have them considered. You tied your hands securely by the adoption of the present rules of the House and in selecting your Speaker. Under the conditions that exist you have done, to illustrate, the same as the man who went out to fight his adversary and before entering the ring had his hands tied behind him. He voluntarily and of his own will secured a referee to referee the fight who he knew did not want his adversary touched.

That is the condition that prevailed when you introduced these measures. Therefore I contend that now is the time, because of the necessity, that these schedules ought to be revised; and we ought now, and we have the time at this session, to take up these matters, look into them, and do something to protect the people from the enormous amount of money that is annually being paid, as the figures have been shown to you that we are paying, in excess of what we should to these corporations.

These great corporations may submit to legislation that will only trim off the rough edges. But when you come to lay the ax at the root of the tree, when you come to strike at the evil, to strike at the thing that enables them to control the markets of this country, you will find them all standing together. Therefore, I contend, as a representative of my constituents, that the thing we ought first to do is to strike at the very root of the power of the trusts of this country and take away the power to drive out competition.

I have heard it asserted upon the floor of the House that the duty upon a certain article was too insignificant to afford the trust or combination power to raise the price to the place where they are maintaining it. I desire to give you my idea of how they do this with this sort of a tariff.

To illustrate: I live in the State of Iowa; my friend here [Mr. HAMMOND] lives in the State of Minnesota, just across the line. He is manufacturing an article that he can sell in the State of Iowa for $10. I am manufacturing the same article in the State of Iowa. I secure an act of the legislature of my State, conceding they have the power to pass such a law, placing a duty of $2 upon that article. I place it upon the market at $11.50. My friend from Minnesota has to leave the State of Iowa, because he can no longer compete with me. After he has gone back home and sought other markets, I raise the price of my article to $15, $18, or $20. Why, you say, it is not the tariff that permitted that rise in price. Why? Because the price has gone up so much higher than the original price of the article and the duty added. The reason is, my competitor knows that the minute he comes back to the State of Iowa, if he knows enough to transact business, I can put it down again to where he can not compete with me. That settles it. I, by combination and trust methods, control the market within my State limits, and I can sell the article at any price consumption will stand. [Applause.] That is the way the tariff works for the trusts and combinations of this country; that is why it ought to be reduced and save the people annually, according to the figures I have given you from the statement of Mr. Van Cleave, $900,000,000, an amount sufficient to pay all the expenses of the Government for one year. The people are not opposed to paying any tax that may be necessary for the support of the Government economically administered.

Their patriotism will lead them to make any sacrifice that is necessary to support the Government. The only thing they complain of is that, under the guise of supporting the Government, you have made the schedules so high that these corporations are permitted to take from them more for the domestic article than they should by rights receive.

Therefore, I repeat it again. Let some of these measures come out of the Committee on Ways and Means, let them be passed, and show to the people of this country our good faith.

And I want to say to my friends upon the Republican side of the House that with all of the abuse that you are heaping daily upon the head of John D. Rockefeller you have fooled the people for a long time in making them believe that there is no duty upon petroleum; but when the intelligent people of this country thoroughly understand the condition of this matter I say that you will be held responsible for not passing the bill introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN] or some other measure of that kind. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And you can not avoid it. You can not take consolation from the old maxim, "We must all hang together or we will hang separately." [Laughter.] But I want to say to you that the American people are aroused, not like a mob, not like a rabble, but an intelligent people moving steadily forward, and they are not going to be disappointed any more. You will have to suffer the consequences of the new maxim, "Either separate or you will all hang together." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I desire again to call attention to the last message of the President of the United States, and I do hope that some of the things he has advocated in that message may become a law at this session. I should like to have an opportunity of sitting in my seat in this House and voting for them. And again, if the facts are true, as stated by the President in his last message, it is the most scathing indictment that was ever written against the statesmanship of this country for the last twenty-five years. If conditions exist as is there claimed, and I admit they do, who is responsible? Why is it that the malefactors and the high financiers of this country have been permitted to impose on the innocent citizenship of the nation? Who has had charge and control of every branch of the Government—legislative, judicial, and executive—practically for the last forty years? It is that statesmanship, I care not of what political party, that is responsible for the conditions of which the President of the United States speaks. I say that if it is not true, it is the duty of every man who is a Member of this House to rise in his place and declare it to be untrue, and to oppose the President of the United States upon these propositions. The indictment is written, and you must either plead guilty to it or you must fight back. There is no defense except to show that the allegations of this message are untrue. We ask you today, What are you going to do about it? Are you going to admit that the party that has had control of this Government for the last twenty-five years has been derelict in its duty and has failed properly to care for the interests of the people? You can not plead ignorance, because from one end of this land to the other the Democratic party has been telling you for these many years that just such a condition as now exists would come to pass unless there was some legislation to prevent it.

While this corruption that is now complained of was attaining the stage that it has reached, while it was springing from the fertile soil of industry and prosperity in this country, you were told that unless certain legislation was placed upon the statute books it would finally become so powerful and grow to such wonderful stature and would extend its branches and ramify to every part of the Government and business interests of the country until it controlled them. You did not listen, but you sat beneath its protecting shade and told the people of the country simply to have confidence in you and you would protect them. It seems to me that when this second message was read, which so thoroughly attacked the tree of corruption that has grown up and sheltered many statesmen of this country for the last twenty-five years, some one certainly would have the gratitude to rise up and say:

Woodman, spare that tree!
Touch not a single bough!
In youth it sheltered me,
And I'll protect it now.

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The people of this country are intelligent. The patriotic American citizen has come to the condition where he thinks, where he reasons, and there is no other logical conclusion to be arrived at, except to hold responsible for the conditions that now exist the party that has been in control of the affairs of the nation and to demand that that party surrender control. You contend that some legislation has been enacted which is beneficial to the people of the country. You cite us to the rate bill and several other measures. We concede that some measures have been passed which are beneficial to the people and that perhaps others may be passed at this session of Congress; but remember there has not been a measure along the line of reform passed by this House or the last House, and there will not be a measure passed by this House that has not been wrung from you by compulsion from the White House; and you had as well say to me that you can conduct a religious crusade with men who have been compelled to confess their Christ at the muzzle of a gun as to conduct a political reform by the men who are compelled to pass legislation because they are afraid of losing their office. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There are a host of statesmen in this country who for twenty-five years have been preaching the doctrine of the President's message. They are honest. They are not spasmodic. They have preached it because they believe it is right. They are determined to carry this measure to the line of absolute justice, and the people are not going to longer trust it in the hands of those who have either been incompetent or negligent as to the interests of the people. They are determined to have men without entangling alliances or former condition of servitude. [Applause.]

No one can logically maintain that if the conditions exist which the President in his message says do exist, they could exist without incompetent statesmanship or negligent statesmanship which permitted them to reach the point they now occupy. These are facts which you must meet. These are facts upon which the people want clear declarations. They are not longer content with the proposition that after the next Presidential election we will revise the tariff. Some one is going to be fooled about that plank in the platform. I do not know who that fellow is. They are going to say, "We are in favor of revising the tariff, but we do not know whether it is the fellow who wants it revised up or the one who wants it revised down that is going to be satisfied when the revision comes;" and I say with all candor that I do not believe that the profession in that platform that they intend to revise the tariff is an honest profession. I believe they want to deceive somebody, or else they would revise it before election.

They want to say to some fellow over here who wants the schedules raised, "Why, we have not said which way we will go; we will probably put your commodity up." And then in the State of Iowa, where the people want a revision, they will say, "We are going to revise the tariff as soon as the Presidential election is over." The people can not, the President claims in his message, be cool and deliberate just before Presidential elections. He claims they can be cool and be deliberate enough to enact legislation affecting the most critical financial condition that ever existed in the country, but not to revise the tariff. I maintain that he is right in the first instance, and therefore, as a matter of fact, wrong in the last.

But the people are going to demand something to show them that they may be satisfied, that they may know that when the tariff is revised it is going to be revised in the interest of the consumers of this country once at least, and that is what we desire. [Applause.]

It does not make much difference what you place in the platform, either at Chicago or at Denver. The people have awakened; they have not lost confidence. No; it is not the lack of confidence on the part of the people, but the people have come into an actual knowledge of conditions. [Applause.] They are determined to remedy them. Their platform is made and they are going to stand upon that platform, and it is sufficient by which to measure every principle or every problem for solution in this country to-day. It is the Democracy of Jefferson, "Equal justice to all men and special privileges to none" [applause]; the Republicanism of Lincoln, "A government of the people, by the people, and for the people." [Applause.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLLIDAY.]

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Mr. Chairman, I propose to devote a few moments to the consideration of that portion of the Army bill which deals with the pay of the enlisted men of the Army. I realize that I am breaking all precedents when I get up and talk about an appropriation bill and address myself to a feature of that bill, but I will take that risk, and I want to call your attention briefly to that measure herein proposed.

The Committee on Military Affairs recognize the fact that something must be done to keep the ranks of the Army complete and full. It is necessary that better inducements should be held out to men to enlist. We must realize that men in going into the ranks of the Army and binding themselves to serve three years are entitled to something more than the wages they can earn at home. If a man is working at a job and he does not like his job, he can quit it and hunt another. If an officer of the Army gets tired of his employment, he can resign and go home, but when an enlisted man gets tired and goes home before his time is out he gets into serious difficulty.

That matter ought to be considered in fixing the pay of the private soldiers, and therefore the committee, after giving the matter careful consideration, was of the unanimous opinion that something should be done and unanimously agreed upon what that should be. Mr. Chairman, the world has been made up of hero worshippers ever since it existed. We hear through all ages and all times the praises of the great leaders of men in military campaigns, but we hear comparatively little or nothing of the men who actually win the battles. The great war heroes of history—Alexander, Cæsar, Charlemagne, Napoleon, Frederick the Great, Von Moltke, Oyama—won their victories, not because of their transcendant military genius, but because of the magnificent quality of the fighting men who were in the ranks of their respective armies at that time. [Applause.] I believe that when the future history of our country is written the historian will not find that in the late Spanish war any great amount of military strategy was displayed. We will search the pages of future history to see where any one man particularly distinguished himself, but the historian of the future will say to the world that the fact was demonstrated that the American Regular Army, for its size, was and is the best fighting machine in the world. And I think that these matters should be considered, and I think here and now in this great forum of the people somebody should pay a tribute to the men behind the guns.

Mr. Chairman, I sometimes visit the great graveyard over the river, that Valhalla of America, and I like to gaze upon those magnificent monuments erected there. I like to read and contemplate the great historic names inscribed there, but my profoundest reverence is moved when I come to the monument inscribed to the unknown dead, the monument erected to the memory of men of whom the world knows nothing except that they gave the free full measure of their lives that the country they loved so well might live. No artist, no sculptor, has made marble effigies of these men. The poets have not sung their praises, nor have writers sounded their virtues, but they did their duty, silently, unobtrusively, gallantly, they gave up their lives that the country might applaud whom? Simply the men who led them! And so, Mr. Chairman, while I would not remove one laurel from the wreaths that encircle the brows of the great heroes of our own country or any other country, I think the time has come when at some place and in some manner—and no other place could be more fitting than this great forum of the people—somebody should pay some tribute to the gallant men behind the guns and in the trenches. [Applause.] The inquiry may be made why we did not in this bill provide for an increase in pay of the army officers. I recognized, and I think every member of the committee recognized, that the junior officers of our Army are underpaid, that their pay ought to be increased, but there is not the same present demand for it, and the explanation of that is very simple. We can not get the men that we want, and we can get every officer that we want without any trouble at all; and so while we believe there is an emergency requiring the increase of pay for the officers, we do not believe that that emergency is so great that it will justify us in increasing it on an appropriation bill.

I would like to see this House at this time pay the usual tribute to the gallant enlisted men of our nation by passing this bill without a single dissenting voice, without a single question being raised as to our right to put it here. It would be a splendid tribute to these men, and they have had little enough of it. We have listened for days and hours and almost weeks in the committee to the troubles of the men who wear swords, as to whether some man should be a quartermaster, as to how this man should be assigned, and how the situation should be arranged, and how many more or less of officers should be here in Washington, but it is very rarely that our attention has been called to the men who will have to win our battles in the last analysis, if we ever have any battles. So, I say to you, my friends, without regard to politics, without regard to feeling in this matter, let us pay this tribute to the men. Let it be said that when the question was raised of doing tardy justice to the gallant men who fill our ranks, every man in the American Congress stood as a unit in his behalf. [Applause.] I do not believe you can do it on any other bill. I am generally opposed to legislating upon an appropriation bill, but I believe that this should be made an exception, and I hope it will be made an exception and I hope that no man will arise in his place and prevent us from doing now and at once what we ought to have done a good many years ago.

Just now there is a great deal of public sentiment aroused in regard to these matters. The people are getting clearer light about it; we are getting clearer light about the men, the enlisted men, the world all over. In other words, the time has come when the great leaders of men, the Napoleons of finance and others, must be laid aside for a few minutes while we consider the plain, common American with whom we have to deal. As Lincoln once said: "God must have loved them or he would not have made so many of them." I desire here to state in my place in the House and everywhere else, whenever the question comes up of lifting up the whole mass of humanity in the United States, I lend my voice and my vote and my influence to it, and whenever the question comes of doing something for these modest, quiet, uncomplaining men, who serve their country day and night and who have practically parted with their liberty in order to help the country, then I am glad to have an opportunity of saying and doing something in their behalf. [Applause.] I think few men realize, who have never passed through it, just what it is for a man to say by a little stroke of the pen, "for three years I am not my own master. I go where I am ordered, I eat what I can get, I wear the clothes prescribed for me; in war or in peace, in cold or in heat, by night or by day, I hold myself ready and pledged to obey orders given me whether I like them or not." We ought to consider that, and I hope we will do it. There is no question of politics embraced in this, there is no question of antagonism to the higher officers embraced in it. If anybody imagines from what I have said here on this occasion that I feel any resentment toward the men who command our Army, I want to disclaim it here and now. The only point I want to urge is that they have plenty of men to look after them at both ends of this Capitol; especially at the other end they are competent to take care of those gentlemen day and night, but it is seldom we hear of a proposition to take care of the men who have no representatives or lobbyists here and who could not get here and talk to us unless they left their posts of duty, for which they would be sent to jail or made to wear a ball and chain. Let us remember them, gentlemen, let us do them substantial justice, and let us do it now and do it quickly. [Applause.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK].

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to read a copy of certain resolutions adopted by the executive committee of the National Editorial Association of the United States at its recent meeting held in this city on January 27. I respectfully invite the attention and consideration of this committee while these resolutions are being read, assuring you that this memorial voices not only the sentiments, but the will and the wish of the entire fraternity of newspaper publishers of this country, if I am correctly advised, and I believe I am. The publishers of 10,000 newspapers, both large and small, of this great nation most justly ask and demand, Mr. Chairman, that the tariff on wood pulp be removed; for by the operation of this tariff not only are our forests being devastated, but competition has been stifled and the cost of print paper has been practically doubled within a very short time. The tariff on wood pulp is not therefore a protection to our rapidly disappearing forests; it is not a protection to the people or to labor. Can anyone tell why or what the tariff on wood pulp does protect except the trusts? And I might add this is also true in very many of the protected articles. I do not care to enter into any discussion of the tariff question at this time, for many of the publishers, no doubt a majority of them, who make up this great editorial association are of political faith opposite to mine, and for sundry reasons would not care or desire to have so humble an instrument chop at the rotten roots of our protective system. The fact remains true, nevertheless, that both the Republican and Democrat publisher alike is dead against this wood-pulp duty and the promise to remove the tariff at some future time does not sound good in his ears.

We talk of the power of the press; we tell the editor when we are running for office of the great influence he wields for good and civic righteousness, and what wonders the printing press has accomplished. We tell him how it has made opssible our present high standard of civilization; but whether you are sincere or not, my fellow-colleagues, when you give utterance to such sentiments you tell the truth, and the exact truth, too. Without the press the Bible to-day would be found only on high spots, in sacred sanctuary, a roll of parchment here and there. Where only a small per cent of our 80,000,000 of people are to-day unable to read, without the newspapers and the press only a small per cent could read. All of these facts you well know. What, then, is the duty of Congress? Is it right to make this powerful agency for good—and the pulpit and the press go hand in hand to lift up humanity and to elevate and better the condition of all mankind—pay tribute to a greedy few? Must we wait until a few in control of this House conclude, in their great wisdom, the conditions are ripe? Do you say to the newspaper publishers, "When we get ready we will attend to this wood-pulp business?" No; in words you do not; you would not dare to say this, but by act you do. A good Republican colleague has introduced a bill to place oil on the free list. He is a friend of the people. He means well, but he is a new Member, like myself, and has not learned that this is neither the time nor the place to do anything for the people. He does not know that this can only be done in the presence and by the consent of John D., king of petroleum; Harriman, king of the rails, and the party leaders. But listen, at least, to the petition sent to you by the newspapers from every Congressional district and from every State in the Union:

MEMORIAL.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

Whereas it has been established beyond controversy that the forests of the United States that afford pulp for the manufacture of print paper are being rapidly exhausted and are under control of a combination that prevents fair business competition; and

Whereas the labor in paper mills of the country amounts to only $4,200,000 per annum, and the condition of manufacture of paper is such as to make successful competition possible with the markets of the world without protection; and

Whereas the labor employed by newspapers effected by the existing combinations and the tariff is forty times as great as that employed in the paper mills, and is entitled to consideration and protection against the results arising from the demolishing of our forests, and against a movement that has taken advantage of tariff legislation to oppress and tax a purely American industry; and

Whereas a tax upon news print, or the material entering into the manufacture of the same, is a tax upon knowledge and upon the education of the people: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the executive committee of the National Editorial Association of the United States, representing 10,000 daily and weekly newspapers of this country, respectfully memorialize the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States to remove all duties on printing paper, wood pulp, and all materials entering into the manufacture of printing paper.

The people are impatient for a revision of the tariff, but the newspaper publishers are even more impatient that this wall of protection be removed; that all materials used in the manufacture of printing paper be permitted to enter this country free of duty. They ask this, Mr. Chairman, not some time, not at some convenient season, but at this session of this Congress. I therefore earnestly entreat you that their demands may have your speedy and favorable consideration, and permit me to add that it strikes me that this distinguished body has time to burn, time to kill, that ought to be employed for the betterment of all the people and cease to be what it appears to a new Member to be—a stand-pat, do-little bunch. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the chairman of the committee, I yield forty-five minutes, or such time thereof as he may desire, to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WASHBURN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WASHBURN] is recognized for forty-five minutes.

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read a communication, which, in common with the Senators and other Representatives from New England, I have received from the Boston Wholesale Grocers' Association.

BOSTON WHOLESALE GROCERS' ASSOCIATION,
Boston, January 29, 1908.

To the honarble Senators and Representatives of Massachusetts and the New England States:

The following resolutions with regard to the Sherman antitrust law were unanimously passed at a meeting of this association held January 9, 1908, and by the Executive Association of the Wholesale Grocers of New England, January 14, 1908:

"Whereas the wholesale grocers as well as merchants in other lines of business throughout the country are confronted with serious obstacles as to trade agreements; and

"Whereas his excellency the President has declared that there are good agreements as well as bad agreements, but unfortunately the Sherman antitrust law makes no distinction between them; and

"Whereas the Sherman antitrust law prohibits all agreements and such as we believe are beneficial to society and necessary to the success of all business; and

"Whereas there is a difference between an agreement that amounts to a conspiracy to extort exorbitant prices, and an agreement which only seeks to secure the existence of the dealer, customary forms and terms, uniform prices, and a reasonable margin for service rendered the manufacturer in the distribution of his product in detail; and

"Whereas what we should have is a law that will enable us to protect ourselves from dishonest, deceptive methods in business, graft, discrimination, and criminal competition, by having reasonable agreements between ourselves and the manufacturer, in no way injurious to the public and beneficial to all, and with the power and right to enforce them; such agreements not to be operative until indorsed by the Interstate Commerce Commission:

"Resolved, That the Sherman antitrust law, in so far as it prevents agreements not injurious to the public, is detrimental to the interests of merchants, and tends to stifle and prevent organization and cooperation among trade associations, which seek only to preserve their commercial existence in the face of the efforts of powerful and selfish monopolies to gradually eliminate the individual dealer.

"Resolved, That if a proper legal construction of antitrust laws embodies a prohibition of cooperation among merchants, said laws are fundamentally wrong in their conception, enactment, and operative effect and require amendment.

"Resolved, That we earnestly request the Senators and Representatives of Massachusetts and New England to use their best efforts to have the Sherman antitrust law amended so as to be agreeable and consistent with the sentiments and suggestions of the preamble and resolutions contained herein, or its supersedure by a new law which shall make a distinction between good agreements and bad agreements.

"Resolved, That the law should give a clearer, more definite definition of what shall constitute illegality in trade agreements and the conduct of associated effort. It should contain provision that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall give hearings to such business interests as desire to make trade agreements not inimical to the public good, and said Commission shall decide whether such agreements are legal or illegal."

WM. J. SEAVER, Secretary.

Mr. WASHBURN. In his first message to Congress, in December, 1901, the President of the United States, in speaking of trusts, said:

There is a widespread conviction in the minds of the American people that the great corporations known as "trusts" are, in certain of their features and tendencies, hurtful to the general welfare—it is based upon sincere conviction that combination and concentration should be not prohibited, but supervised.

In speaking of the same subject in his message of December, 1905, he said:

It is generally useless to try to prohibit all restraint on competition, whether this restraint be reasonable or unreasonable; and where it is not useless it is generally hurtful.

And again, in the message of December, 1906:

The actual working of our laws has shown that the effort to prohibit all combinations, good or bad, is noxious where it is not ineffective.

And finally, in his recent message to Congress, the President said:

The antitrust law should not be repealed, but it should be made more efficient and more in harmony with actual conditions. It should be so amended as to forbid only the kind of combination which does harm to the general public, such amendment to be accompanied by or to be an incident of a grant of supervisory power to the Government over these big concerns engaged in interstate business.

The present construction of the Sherman antitrust law works a hardship in that it prohibits reasonable as well as unreasonable agreements in restraint of trade, and its amendment is urgently demanded. The history of this piece of legislation is most instructive, illustrating as it does the difficulty in always reaching by legislation the evil which it is sought to remedy. It may fairly be said of the Sherman Act, which became a law in 1890, that at first it entirely failed of its purpose; that it was successfully invoked against combinations of labor which it was never intended by its framers to affect, and that when so construed by the Supreme Court as to become completely effective it almost compelled the formation of the modern trust as we have known it for the last ten years, and worked a great hardship upon the business community in forbidding all agreements in restraint of trade, whether reasonable or unreasonable.

The objection to combination is, in general terms, this:

That the great aggregations of capital which now exist in various branches of business are harmful to the people in that they make possible a monopoly of many articles necessary to our comfort and well being and leave in the hands of the few the regulating of prices at which such articles shall be sold, and that by the stifling of competition thus effected prices are unduly enhanced and that the few profit at the expense of the many.

This question has been agitated for hundreds of years. The freedom of the labor contract was not recognized during some centuries, and as long ago as 1349 and 1350 the famous "Statutes of Laborers" was passed in England, by reason of a scarcity of laborers caused by the great plague, which provided substantially both that laborers might be compelled to work and that the rate of wages should be legally limited. This statute was passed to prevent laborers from combining against their employers. In the reign of George I an act, known as the "Bubble act," made it a crime punishable with death and confiscation of goods to form voluntary associations and to issue transferable shares, and the courts declared that the clubbing together of numbers of persons with transferable shares for the purpose of carrying on trade is calculated to put down individual industry and competition. In the reign of George III two statutes were enacted—one to prevent combinations by partnership or otherwise in the purchase or sale of bricks, and another declaring it unlawful for five or more persons to unite in covenant or partnership to purchase coals for sale.

These three statutes, it will be noticed, are intended to prevent combinations to govern prices for certain commodities. In England in the seventeenth century four-fifths of the common people were employed in agricultural pursuits; their wages averaged from 4s. to 6s. a week, and every laborer who received more and every employer who gave more than the authorized sum was liable to punishment. Manufacturers complained that English mechanics exacted a shilling a day, and the cry of labor against capital was as bitter as it has ever been in our day.

Some of our own early legislation is of the same character. In 1633 a statute enacted by the general court in Massachusetts Bay limited the wages of carpenters, masons, and other mechanics to 2s. a day, and several instances occurred where men were fined for receiving 2s. 6d. a day.

The authorities fined merchants for too high prices for their wares, and in 1634 the general court limited the rate of profit at 4d. in the shilling.

One of the colonial acts entitled "An act against oppression" punished by fine and imprisonment such indisposed persons as may take the liberty to oppress and wrong their neighbors by taking excessive wages for their work or unreasonable prices for merchandise or other necessary commodities as may pass from man to man. Another act required artificers or handicraftsmen meet to labor to work by the day for their neighbors in mowing, reaping of corn, and in the inning thereof.

Some of our town records show that under the power to make by-laws, the towns fixed the price of labor, provisions, and several articles of merchandise as late as the time of the Revolutionary war. Experience and increasing intelligence led in time to the removal of all such restrictions and to the establishment of freedom in all branches of labor and business.

A monopoly has been defined as a grant by the sovereign power of the exclusive right to make or deal in anything, and, of course, strictly speaking there is no such thing as a monopoly in this country; but they did exist in the early history of England, and so great did this abuse become that, upon his accession, in 1623 James I voluntarily rescinded all the exclusive privileges by which his predecessor had attempted to restrict domestic commerce. The foreign trade, however, still remained under the control of the great merchant companies, comprising in all about 200 citizens of London, who, by combining among themselves, raised or lowered prices at their pleasure. By the "statute against monopolies," passed in 1623, all past monopolies were abolished and the power of the Crown to grant them in the future was explicitly denied, excepting in the case of patents for inventions. Inventors of new manufactures were to have conferred upon them the exclusive privilege of practicing such inventions for a limited period of time.

I have stated that the English statute of monopolies, so-called, was confined to domestic commerce, while the foreign trade remained under the control of the great merchant companies, a conspicuous example of which was that incorporated by Queen Elizabeth in 1599 under the name, "Governor and Company of Merchants of London, Trading in the East Indies." The East India Company was in the hands of a few merchants who through it became enormously wealthy, and was a sort of monopoly which would not be tolerated at the present day.

Everyone understands that at common law monopolies and contracts in restraint of trade, although not misdemeanors or indictable offenses, have always been held to be void, but in addition to this many statutes have been passed of a restrictive nature, and probably the members of our State legislatures, who have been passing bills in such profusion in recent years against combinations of various sorts, would be surprised to know that as long ago as 1844 the English Parliament repealed almost as many laws against badgering, ingrossing, forestalling, and regrating as have been passed in this country in the last twenty years. This act of 1844 abolished eighteen English, ten Scotch, and eight restrictive Irish statutes.

The only point that I would make here is that this evil of combinations had long been recognized, and had long been legislated against, but that such legislation was found to be of little avail. I referred a moment ago to the fact that at common law monopolies and contracts in restraint of trade were void. The common law, so-called, of England, that is to say, to adopt the definition of Chancellor Kent: "Those rules of action which do not rest for their authority upon any positive declaration of the will of the legislature," was early adopted and is the basis of jurisprudence in America in all the States, excepting Louisiana, so that without regard to any statutes it has always been the law in this country that monopolies and contracts in restraint of trade are void. As all lawyers and most laymen know, there are two grounds for the doctrine that such contracts, as applied for example to the individual, are against public policy; one is the injury to the public by being deprived of the restricted party's industry, and the other the injury to the party himself by being precluded from following his occupation and thus prevented from supporting himself and his family. Take a very simple example: If a shoemaker were to agree that he would never again prosecute his business, this would be a contract in restraint of trade which would be void for the reasons which I have given, but there is the important limitation which governs such contracts, and it is that a contract which is only in partial restraint of trade is good if not unreasonable and supported by a consideration.

It is not always true that competition is the life of trade, for it often may be the ruin of business, and this fact has been recognized by the courts.

This, then, was the law in this country from the earliest times, and it may be briefly stated as follows:

That the validity of contracts restricting competition was to be determined by the reasonableness of the restriction. If the main purpose or nature and inevitable effect of the contract was to suppress competition or create a monopoly, it was illegal; if a contract imposed a restriction that was unreasonably injurious to the public interest or a restriction that was greater than the interest of the party in whose favor it was imposed demanded, it was illegal; but contracts made for a legal purpose which were not unreasonably injurious to the public welfare and which imposed no heavier restraint on trade than the interest of the favored party required had been uniformly sustained, notwithstanding their tendency to some extent to check competition. Under this construction of the law there had grown up a habit, particularly among manufacturers and merchants, of forming associations, the rules of which fixed the prices of the products, which all the members of the association were supposed to adhere to, and these associations were commonly spoken of as combinations, and as time went on the prices of a large variety of products were regulated in this way. To be sure they were not strictly adhered to, but the general results were thought to be advantageous to the producers. These so-called "combinations" were popularly considered to be inimical to the public interests, and since 1888 a large number of States, at least thirty-seven, have passed "antitrust laws," designed to prevent combinations of this sort. Some of these statutes were very drastic.

As a rule, legislation of this sort was not effective, either because it did not go far enough or went so far as to be unconstitutional. Furthermore, as practically all our large business operations are interstate in their character some national legislation was clamored for.

This led to the passage of the so-called Sherman Act of July 2, 1890, which was passed with a view, as it was then stated, to extend the provisions of the common law to interstate commerce, over which Congress has control, and to enforce that principle by a suitable penalty. Consequently the act recites that every contract of combination in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or foreign nations is illegal, and that every person engaged in such combination or a party to such a contract shall be punishable by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both. This act was thought to be in the interests of the people in that it would prevent combinations which might unduly enhance the prices of articles. That this was the intention of the framers of the law is very clear from an examination of the debates in Congress, in the course of which Senator Hoar said:

> We have affirmed the old doctrine of the common law in regard to all interstate and international commercial transactions.

Senator Sherman said:

> It does not announce a new principle of law, but applies old and well-recognized principles of the common law to the complicated jurisdiction of our State and Federal Government. Similar contracts in any State in the Union are now by common or statute law null and void.

It is clear enough from the debates in Congress that all that this act was intended to do was to extend the provisions of the common law to interstate commerce.

Labor organizations were evidently not thought of, and indeed this legislation, if it were passed in the interests of any class, must be presumed to have been passed in the interest of wage-earners. It is instructive, therefore, to examine the cases which arose under this act and to observe how uniformly the act failed to prevent the alleged abuses which it was supposed to remedy—how almost invariably it was held to apply to combinations of labor which it was not framed to reach and, finally, how its construction by the Supreme Court has led directly and of necessity to the formation of the great trusts of the present day. One of the early cases that arose under this act was in 1892. It appeared that a distilling and cattle-feeding company, organized under the laws of Illinois, obtained control of seventy other distilleries by purchase, renting, or lease, and controlled 75 per cent of the entire product in the United States, and were thus able to control the price at which they would sell to dealers and at which dealers should sell. The company also promised that, if purchasers would buy all their supplies from the company's agents and would not sell below the list price, they would receive a rebate.

Now, this would appear upon its face a contract of the nature intended to be reached by the Sherman Act, but this was not the opinion of the court, which held (52 Fed. Rep., 104; 1892) that this was not a monopoly, because there was no exclusive right to engage in the business of distilling and others were not prevented from engaging in the business and was not of the general character necessary to constitute an unlawful contract in restraint of trade.

The same reasoning was applied by another court in a case which arose in the same year, in which it appeared that the dealers in lumber had combined and raised the price 50 cents a thousand. The court said (52 Fed. Rep., 646; 1892) that this contract was not in contravention of the Sherman antitrust act, because it did not involve absorption of the entire traffic in lumber and was not entered into for the purpose of obtaining the entire control of that traffic, so that—and it is unnecessary to mulitply the examples—the act, so far as it affected the trade combinations, was almost entirely futile, but, curious to relate, this act was successfully invoked against combinations of labor.

We all well remember that in 1894 there was a strike at the works of the Pullman Palace Car Company, the operatives having been refused an advance in wages, whereupon Debs and his associates, members of an organization known as the "American Railway Union," endeavored to compel the Pullman Company to yield by preventing the railroads from using Pullman cars, and strikes for this purpose were incited among the employees of some of the railroads. The plan of the boycott, as shown by the evidence, was this: The members of the American Railway Union, whose duty it was to handle Pullman cars, were to refuse to do so, with the hope that the railway companies, fearing a strike, would decline further to haul them in their trains and inflict a great pecuniary injury upon the Pullman Company. In case the railway companies failed to yield to the demand, every effort was to be made to tie up and cripple the doing of any business whatever by them, and particular attention was to be directed to the freight traffic, which was known to be their chief source of revenue.

As the lodges of the American Railway Union extended from the Allegheny Mountains to the Pacific coast, it will be seen that it was contemplated by those engaged in carrying out this plan that in case of a refusal of the railway companies to join the union in its attack upon the Pullman Company there should be a paralysis of the railway traffic of every kind throughout that vast territory traversed by lines using Pullman cars. It was to be accomplished, not only by the then members of the union, but also by procuring through persuasion and appeal all employees not members, either to join the union or to strike without joining, by guaranteeing that if they would strike the union would not allow one of its members to return to work until they also were restored.

The court held (62 Fed. Rep., 801; 1894) that such a combination, with the purpose of paralyzing the interstate commerce of the country, was an unlawful conspiracy, and was within the act of July 2, 1890. An injunction was issued against Debs and his associates, and this and other kindred cases aroused much discussion of the subject of "government by injunction."

As one judge put it:

> The primary object of the Sherman Act was undoubtedly to prevent the destruction of legitimate and healthy competition in interstate commerce by individuals, corporations, and trusts grasping, engrossing, and monopolizing the markets for commodities, but its provisions are broad enough to reach a combination or conspiracy that would interrupt the transportation of such commodities from one State to another.

But by the judgment rendered by the Supreme Court March 22, 1897 (17 S. C. R., 540), the Sherman Act received a construction very different from any that had been given to it in the lower courts. It appeared that some eighteen railroad companies had formed an association known as the "Trans-Missouri Freight Association," and were engaged in transporting freight among the several States and had certain agreements touching the rate of freight, etc., such as are common in similar associations, and a bill was brought against the association for the purpose of dissolving it, the contention being that the association was in direct contravention of the provisions of the Sherman Act, but the lower courts held that the agreement on which this association was based could not be held to be a contract or conspiracy in restraint of trade under the antitrust act, that the contract was reasonable, and that the tendency had been to diminish rather than to enhance rates. (58 Fed. Rep., 58.)

When this case got up to the Supreme Court, however, not only was this opinion reversed, but the whole law on this subject was changed, and it was held that contracts declared by the Sherman Act to be illegal included all combinations in restraint of trade, whether they were such as were held legal or illegal at common law and whether the restraint proposed was reasonable or unreasonable. The court referred to the fact that it was claimed that Congress had passed this act merely to restrain such trusts as the beef trust, Standard Oil trust, steel trust, barb fence-wire trust, sugar trust, cordage trust, cottonseed oil trust, whisky trust, and others, but said that the results of combinations of all kinds have an essential similarity and have been induced by motives of individual or corporate aggrandizement, as against the public interest; that such combinations, by dictating the price at which the article shall be sold, have a tendency to drive out of business all the small dealers; that it is in the power of such combinations to deprive the country of the services of a large number of small but independent dealers, and that such a transference of the independent business man into a mere servant or agent was not for the interests of the country, and that the Sherman Act applied to all contracts in restraint of trade, whether they be reasonable or unreasonable.

It followed from this decision that all contracts affecting interstate commerce which in any way restrained trade, whether reasonable or unreasonable, were invalid.

This decision in the Trans-Missouri case had a powerful influence in hastening the formation of the great consolidations or trusts with which we are familiar.

The decision of the Supreme Court has, as a matter of course, been followed by the lower courts. The trade combinations, which before that decision had been held to be legal, were by it made illegal. It became impossible, therefore, for manufacturers and others safely to enter into any agreement, however reasonable, for the maintenance of prices, and hence they were driven to the conclusion that if they could not combine they must unite; in other words, it being illegal for A, B, and C to agree together to maintain reasonable prices for their products, they were compelled to consolidate their interests to get the protection they needed.

The packing-house consolidation was the direct result of the interpretation of the law by the Supreme Court, to which I have called your attention. The packing houses, prevented by the law from agreeing upon a scale of prices, consolidated the competing industries into one great corporation.

Mr. Knapp, chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, has said:

> I believe the most mischievious piece of legislation in the history of the country is the Sherman antitrust law, as interpreted by the United States Supreme Court. It is intolerable and strikes a blow at development and progress.

The Sherman antitrust act should be amended so that contracts not illegal at the common law—that is, contracts made for a legal purpose, not unreasonably injurious to the public welfare, and which impose no heavier restraint on trade than the interests of the favored party require—should not be forbidden by the Sherman antitrust act. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 17288) and had come to no resolution thereon.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5675) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the middle and eastern districts of Tennessee, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 5676) for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of the estate of James T. McKissack (with the accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 5677) for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of the estate of James T. McKissack.

Mr. OWEN introduced a bill (S. 5678) to prohibit stock gambling, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CULBERSON introduced a bill (S. 5679) for the relief of the estate of Thomas W. Abney, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. du PONT introduced a bill (S. 5680) granting a pension to William H. Christy, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SIMMONS introduced a bill (S. 5681) granting an increase of pension to John House, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5682) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in favor of Harriet Andrews, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CURTIS introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 5683) granting an increase of pension to Thomas A. Skrivan;

A bill (S. 5684) granting an increase of pension to Henry Arnold, sr.;

A bill (S. 5685) granting a pension to Emma S. Schletzbaum;

A bill (S. 5686) granting an increase of pension to H. H. Frampton; and

A bill (S. 5687) granting an increase of pension to Josephine K. Woodson (with accompanying papers).

Mr. BURKETT introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 5688) granting a pension to Jennie G. Odell;

A bill (S. 5689) granting a pension to Tabitha C. Hauser;

A bill (S. 5690) granting an increase of pension to Thomas S. Wineteer;

A bill (S. 5691) granting an increase of pension to John W. Smith;

A bill (S. 5692) granting an increase of pension to Milton I. Woodard; and

A bill (S. 5693) granting an increase of pension to Thornton S. Crosley (with accompanying papers).

Mr. PENROSE introduced a bill (S. 5694) to provide for the lading or unlading of vessels at night, to facilitate the entry of vessels, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 5695) granting an increase of pension to David Price; and

A bill (S. 5696) granting a pension to Sarah E. Burns.

Mr. CLAPP (for Mr. BEVERIDGE) introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 5697) granting an increase of pension to George W. Wood;

A bill (S. 5698) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Walcutter; and

A bill (S. 5699) granting an increase of pension to Julia C. Harding.

Mr. McCREARY (by request) introduced a bill (S. 5700) to stimulate and promote the efficiency of clerks of the United States courts, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BACON introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 5701) for the relief of Walter Wadsworth; and

A bill (S. 5702) for the relief of George T. Reeves.

Mr. BANKHEAD introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 60) to provide for a survey of a portion of Coosa River, Alabama, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of the assistant in the Senate document room from $1,600 to $2,000, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment providing for the appointment of two examiners in the field force, Civil Service Commission, at $2,400 each, and one examiner at $2,200, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DICK submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to add to the freedmen's roll of the Choctaw Indians the names of all minors who were entitled to enrollment and allotment under the act of April 26, 1906, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment extending the provisions of section 9 of the act of April 26, 1906, to the claims of Chester Howe, his associates and assigns, for services rendered the Mississippi Choctaw Indians, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR ASBURY C. LATIMER.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the Vice-President in arranging for and attending the funeral of the late Senator Asbury C. Latimer from the State of South Carolina, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

STATUE OF GEN. JAMES MILLER.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 45) for the erection of a statue to the memory of Gen. James Miller at Peterboro, N. H.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to appropriate $5,000 for the erection of a statue, in bronze or granite, to the memory of Gen. James Miller, the hero of Lundys Lane, at Peterboro, N. H., which sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, or such officer as he may designate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. M. C. LATTA, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the following act:

S. 417. An act to extend the time for the completion of a bridge across the Missouri River at Yankton, S. Dak., by the Yankton, Norfolk and Southern Railway Company.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 15219, the Indian appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 15219) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the amendments of the committee be acted upon as they are reached.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota asks that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, under the subhead "President," on page 2, line 13, after the word "dollars," to insert "of which $15,000 shall be immediately available," so as to make the clause read:

To enable the President to cause, under the provisions of the act of February 8, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians," such Indian reservations as in his judgment are advantageous for agricultural and grazing purposes to be surveyed or resurveyed, for the purposes of said act, and to complete the allotment of the same, including the necessary clerical work incident thereto in the field and in the Office of Indian Affairs, and delivery of trust patents, so far as allotments shall have been selected under said act, $75,000, of which $15,000 shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Secretary," on page 3, line 1, after the word "purchase," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That hereafter supplies may be purchased, contracts let, and labor employed for the construction of artesian wells, ditches, and other works for irrigation, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, without advertising as hereinbefore provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 8, to insert:

Hereafter when the Secretary of the Interior deems a new bond necessary he may, in his discretion, require any disbursing officer under the jurisdiction of the Office of Indian Affairs to execute a new bond, with approved sureties, in such amount as he may deem necessary, and when accepted and approved by the Secretary of the Interior the new bond shall be valid and the surety or sureties of the prior bond shall be released from liability for all acts or defaults of the principal which may be done or committed from and after the day on which the new bond was approved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 18, to insert:

The Secretary of the Interior shall take possession of all buildings now or heretofore used for governmental, school, or other tribal purposes, together with the furniture therein and the land appertaining thereto, and appraise and sell the same at such time and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and deposit the proceeds, less expenses incident to the appraisement and sale, in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the respective tribes: Provided, That in the event said lands are embraced within the geographical limits of a State or Territory of the United States such State or Territory or any county or municipality therein shall be allowed one year from date of establishment of said State or Territory within which to purchase any such lands and improvements within their respective limits at not less than the appraised value. Conveyances of lands disposed of under this section shall be executed and delivered in like manner and with like effect as herein provided for other conveyances. And this provision shall apply to the Five Civilized Tribes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Commissioner," on page 4, line 15, after the words "use of," to insert "irrigating tools and appliances and purchase of;" in line 17, before the word "reservoirs," to insert "and," and in line 20, after the word "dollars," to insert "of which twenty-five thousand dollars shall be immediately available;" so as to make the clause read:

For construction of ditches and reservoirs, purchase and use of irrigating tools and appliances and purchase of water rights, including lands necessary for canals, pipe lines, and reservoirs for Indian reservations, in the discretion of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior and subject to his control, $260,000, of which $25,000 shall be immediately available: Provided, That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, may employ superintendents of irrigation, who shall be skilled irrigation engineers, not to exceed five, as in his judgment may be necessary to secure the construction of ditches and other irrigation works in a substantial and workmanlike manner.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 7, after the word "dollars," to insert "of which fifteen thousand dollars shall be immediately available;" so as to make the clause read:

For the survey and subdivision of Indian reservations and of lands to be allotted to Indians, and to make allotments in severalty, to be expended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $75,000, of which $15,000 shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 12, to increase the appropriation to enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to take action to suppress the traffic of intoxicating liquors among the Indians, from $25,000 to $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 15, to increase the appropriation for support of Indian day and industrial schools, etc., from $1,300,000 to $1,400,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 15, to insert:

To enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to conduct experiments on Indian school or agency farms, in cooperation with the Department of Agriculture, designed to test the possibility of soil, climate, etc., in the cultivation of trees, grains, vegetables, and fruit not hitherto raised in those neighborhoods, using Indian labor in the process, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I presumed the bill would be read for information and that the amendments are not to be adopted at the present time.

Mr. CLAPP. Oh, no.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is being read for the consideration of amendments, the amendments of the committee being first considered.

Mr. TELLER. I object to the committee amendments being adopted in this way. I want to have the bill read for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement which was adopted when the bill was laid before the Senate the formal reading of the bill was dispensed with, and the bill is being read for amendment, the committee amendments being first considered. That is the order of the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I did not hear any agreement of that kind proposed. It might have been done. In the confusion one can not always tell what is going on. But this is a bill involving a good many questions, and the amendments of the committee ought not to be adopted without some consideration, or at least without an opportunity of considering them. Of course we may have our recourse when the bill gets into the Senate, but that is not a proper way, in my judgment, to pass a bill of this importance. If the Senator who is in charge of the bill insists on that course, we shall have to submit to it, I suppose.

Mr. CLAPP. Following the usual custom in the presentation of appropriation bills, I asked for the usual consent, simply to save time. I shall not insist on it. If the Senate prefers to have the whole bill read, it will be agreeable to me, if it can do that. That raises a parliamentary question with which I am not familiar.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. BACON. I want to say it is a matter of importance which has suggested itself to a good many Senators, and, at the same time, one in which there is some reluctance to make the suggestion which the Senator from Colorado has, I think, very properly brought up to-day. Under the usual method of procedure the Senate never sees or hears anything in an appropriation bill until it is put upon its passage. When a bill is read in the way it usually is read in the Senate (and not only the bill now in charge of the Senator from Minnesota, but all the appropriation bills are read in this way) really it is an impossibility for Senators who are not on one of the committees to know anything about the bill, and they have to take it very largely on faith.

I think the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado is a very proper one. I do not think the little additional time—not only as to this bill, but all appropriation bills—which is required to have a bill so read that it can be understood by Senators is time which will be wasted.

Mr. CLAPP. It is wholly immaterial to me. I simply followed the custom of the Senate in the consideration of appropriation bills. If it is within the parliamentary law, I am perfectly willing to withdraw the request and have the bill read formally.

Mr. TELLER. I wish the Senator would do so.

Mr. CLAPP. I do so, if it is proper to do it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore made, whereby the formal reading of the pending bill was dispensed with and the bill was to be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered, be reconsidered. Is there objection?

Mr. LODGE. That was not a vote. It was a unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. LODGE. We can not undo a unanimous-consent agreement in that way.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the Senate, which has the power to make a unanimous-consent agreement, can modify the unanimous-consent agreement by unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. By unanimous agreement, certainly.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator from Colorado require anything more than that the entire bill shall be read now and be amended as it is read?

Mr. TELLER. No; I do not want to have the bill amended as it is read. I want to have the bill read. Then I want to have an opportunity to examine the bill. I have not had such an opportunity, and no other Senator until the present time has had it.

Mr. FRYE. I never have known in my experience here that the formal reading of an appropriation bill was required.

Mr. TELLER. But I want the Senator to understand that this is not a common appropriation bill. This is a legislative appropriation bill, and that is the custom with Indian appropriation bills. They contain more legislation, as a rule, than they carry appropriations. This bill has any number of legislative provisions in it. I do not say that I care nothing about the amount of money it proposes to appropriate. I do care about it; but I would not make an interruption of this kind simply to save a few dollars. In the past on this kind of a bill we have enacted some legislation that we ought never to have enacted.

I do not mean to criticise the committee and I do not mean to find fault with this bill, for I do not know that there is any fault to be found with it, but I do believe when a bill contains a large amount of legislation it ought to be read first, and an opportunity should be given to glance at it and understand it, and then if we have any objection that we may make it in a proper way and at a proper time. That can not be done upon the hurried reading of a bill for amendment.

Mr. President, of course, if an objection prevents us from doing this, it can not be done. But I do not think it does, for I think when unanimous consent is given it can be withdrawn in the same way. It is precisely as the Chair suggested. If the chairman of the committee is willing that this should be done, I do not see any trouble in reading the bill. I do not suppose that the chairman of the committee expected that the bill would be passed to-day.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to ask the Senator one more question. If the unanimous-consent agreement is given up and the bill is formally read through, will the Senator then require that it shall be read entirely when it is up for amendment?

Mr. TELLER. No, Mr. President, I would not insist upon that, because every Senator will have an opportunity then to make his objection to the amendments that are proposed, if he desires to make an objection to them.

Mr. President, I think we can afford to read the bill the second time and a third time. It would have been well if some of the bills that have passed the Senate in the last ten or fifteen years had been read a hundred times if you could have escaped what I think is the disgrace of some of the bills we have passed in the last ten or fifteen years touching the Indian question. I only ask that we may have a fair opportunity to see whether the amendments are such as ought to be enacted into law. Of course, that could be done, even if we have to do it when the bill comes into the Senate, but it is more pleasant and better to do it now and in the way I have suggested.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, if the Senate will allow me for a moment, I see what the Senator from Colorado seeks to accomplish. He is a veteran member not only of the Senate, but of the Committee on Appropriations, and he knows the practical difficulties which we have, not perhaps now in the early part of a session with ample leeway in point of time, but toward the end of the session when appropriation bills must be passed.

I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that if the bill is read in full from the desk by the clerks—and it is a long bill—the chances are ten to one that it will not give the bill any more scrutiny. Nobody will stay here while the bill is simply being read in every period and every word, and I am afraid nothing would be gained by it.

But I should not want to agree to the other proposition—that if the time of the Senate is consumed by reading the bill completely from the desk, afterwards, when we come to amendments, the bill may not be read. I think that part of the reading of the bill is essential. I do not think, having read it once at the desk, that we can go on and take up the amendments one after another without reading the bill, because we would miss the scrutiny which Senators ought to give to the bill as its consideration is going along. So it would result in the bill being read twice.

I think, to repeat, it must be read when it comes up for amendment, because it is in following the bill at that stage that Senators see the pertinency of amendments, the place where they come in, and their importance with regard to the text of the bill. So we would get out of the method proposed two actual readings of the bill.

If the Senator, who, as I have said, is a veteran member not only of the Senate, but of the Committee on Appropriations, and one of the most valuable members that we have and who always does more than his part of the work of that committee, thinks we would gain anything at present by reading the appropriation bill word by word, clause by clause, section by section, I would not object, and of course I have no right to object. He can ask that that be done and see on this bill how it works. I rose mainly to say that I think when that has been done and we come to consider the amendments we must have the bill read.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I simply have not any objection to reading of the bill once or twice, or three or four times, if it is necessary. In explanation of what I said, I want to add just a word or two more.

Mr. President, I am not on the committee which reports this bill. I have been on that committee, but I am not at present. I do not mean to reflect on the committee in the slightest degree, but I do say that I think it is my duty to know something about what is in this bill. I know that in the last fifteen years bills have passed the Senate affecting the rights of Indians, which, I am ashamed to say, I did not oppose, because I did not know what was in the bills and because I trusted the committee.

They were bills, Mr. President, which have had a malign influence upon the Indians. Bills intended for their benefit have been used to their hurt. Recently brought in contact with the Indian question as a member of two special committees within a little more than a year, I have determined that so far as I am concerned what little effort I can make shall be made in rectifying the wrongs that we have committed against the Indians under the forms of law.

I do not believe any Senator has a right to accept without examination a bill involving the rights and the liberties and the happiness of the remnant of the native Indians in this land. Mr. President, they may be a dying race, they may be ready to depart, but we will not escape the criticism of the world and our own criticism unless we take steps to do them justice, to keep our engagements, to keep the laws intact that we have made for their benefit and see that they are properly enforced.

Mr. President, I could open a scandal here to-day touching this question that would astonish the American people. I do not propose to do it. Nothing could be gained by it. But I do ask the Senate of the United States to take up these questons when they come here and consider them, and not leave them to a few Senators who are specially, or possibly think they are specially, interested in the settlement and disposition of these matters.

I have been familiar with the Indian question for pretty nearly fifty years. I have made every effort I could from time to time to benefit their condition. I acknowledge my dereliction, Mr. President. I believe I could have done better. I believe I ought to have done better. I propose, so far as I can, to do better in the little time that I shall serve in the Senate. I do not intend that the bill shall pass here without some supervision of the Senate, and it will be my duty and the duty of every other Senator to know what the bill contains. We will not be able, then, in the future to say, "I did not know it was in the bill." I have said that, and other Senators have said it. It is time that we should take up this question as a live question, as one that involves the interest of the Indians and the honor of the American people, and do justice to them, if it is possible to do it at this late day.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, just one word. My experience in the chair leads me——

Mr. TELLER. Let me say one word further for fear that I may be misunderstood. I do not refer to the present legislation when I say I could open up a scandal. I refer to legislation that was accomplished years ago mostly and the execution of the legislation by the Department charged with its execution. I have no criticism to make of the committee; I have no criticism to make of anyone at this time. I am speaking entirely of what has occurred heretofore, and not of what is occurring now.

Mr. FRYE. I simply desire to say, Mr. President, that my experience in the chair leads me to the same conclusion the Senator from Colorado has arrived at, that there has been more important general legislation affecting the rights of men in the Indian appropriation bills than in all the other appropriation bills together. Therefore I do not criticise at all the Senator for asking that the bill be formally read. But I hope that the same request will not be made as to other appropriation bills which shall come to the Senate, where no such necessity exists. Take a river and harbor bill, containing thousands and thousands of items, what on earth should it be read all through formally for?

Mr. TELLER. I have not made any suggestion that I intended to do that. I hope the Senator can distinguish a bill enacted to open up the waterways of the country or to make the ordinary appropriations from a bill affecting the right of two or three hundred thousand people.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator heard what I said, he saw that I was making an exception of the Indian appropriation bill, the same as he was.

Mr. TELLER. That is what I think we ought to make. I am willing to take the bill where it is a question simply of dollars and nothing else, but not where great principles are involved and where the dearest rights of men are jeopardized.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I thought a formal reading would improve the Indian appropriation bill, I should be in favor of a series of formal readings; but my experience here is that where long bills have been formally read, nearly all the Senators leave the Chamber and nothing whatever is gained. The important reading is the second reading, when the bill is read for amendment.

I agree absolutely with what the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has said about the Indian appropriation bill. It comes in here year after year loaded with legislation. I do not mean to say that the legislation is bad or that it is good. I am one of many Senators who do not profess to understand these questions thoroughly; but I think the mischief of the practice is in putting this mass of legislation on this appropriation bill; and, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has said, there is more legislation on the Indian appropriation bill than all the other appropriation bills put together. It is not because we have not had formal readings of such bills, but that we have not time enough to really mark the questions involved. Such new legislation ought really to be taken out on points of order. I do not think that that is the way to legislate away the rights, as the Senator from Colorado has said, of the hundreds of thousands of people who are involved.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that, in the language he uses, he does not speak with his usual accuracy, and his criticism might be construed to refer to the bill now under consideration. I do not think that the Senator at this point in the examination of the bill intended to reflect on, or that his criticism should apply to, the bill now under consideration; yet his language would leave that impression.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this bill came into the Senate on Saturday. I have had no opportunity at all to look at it. If any notice was given that it would be called up to-day, I did not hear that notice. I have tried to follow Indian appropriation bills in the past. When I stated that such bills were loaded with legislation, I referred to the bills in past years, which I have seen go through year after year, carrying legislation very often involving millions of dollars as well as the rights of the Indians. I do not know whether or not there is legislation on this bill, for I have had no chance to look at it; and I was surprised when I came into the Senate this morning to find that the bill had been taken up, because I think it a bill that deserves, so far as my experience goes, very close scrutiny.

My only objection to the formal reading of the bill is that I do not think we should benefit ourselves by following that course. Such a reading is not attended to and, certainly, if the same course was applied to other appropriation bills it would result in a great and useless consumption of time.

But I do think, Mr. President—and that is what I rose to say—that the Senate should be careful in applying its own rules as to legislation on this bill.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I recall very distinctly the long contest that we had on the floor over the last Indian appropriation bill. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], who has charge of the bill, has not forgotten that. Remembering that, Mr. President, I have taken occasion to look at the pending bill, as reported from the committee, not so completely as

I would try to do if present while the bill was being considered, but enough to satisfy me that this is the best Indian appropriation bill that has been reported to the Senate for many years. The things which mainly caused the contest last year have been left out, and I think this is pretty nearly a clean appropriation bill. There may be two or three items upon it subject to the general objections that have been made heretofore, but I want to say that I think the Senator from Minnesota and his committee, taking, I will not say the warning, but the experience of last year, have presented to the Senate an Indian appropriation bill less subject to objection than any I have seen for the last ten years.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, every Indian appropriation bill for many years past has carried on it a large amount of legislation. There should be no criticism of the Committee on Indian Affairs because of that fact. The condition in the Senate has been such as to justify the committee in attempting to secure legislation desirable, as they believe, for the Indians on the Indian appropriation bill, because practically they could not get it in any other way. I do not say that to the discredit of the Senate; but for nearly thirty years, since I have been acquainted with this subject, there has been at no time an earnest interest in this character of legislation. When it came into the Senate it has been left to a few men who came from the section of country where the Indian is located to deal with him, or to another class of men from another section of the country who, when they attempted to deal with the subject, have dealt with it in such a manner as to make it impossible for a bill to pass that would be for the benefit of the settler or for the benefit of the Indian himself.

Mr. President, the great trouble with the Indian question has been that the Indian and the questions concerning him have not been understood. So we have had legislation for a class of men who did not exist, except in the imagination of the few; and the men who had a practical knowledge of the Indian questions of what the Indians needed and what they wanted have been ignored here on this floor again and again by those who had not studied the question, and who therefore did not understand it.

I have no fault to find with the amendments which have been reported to this bill. In the interest of the Indians there ought to be more amendments than are found in the bill, because you can not secure such legislation in separate bills. Why, Mr. President, to meet the demands of Indian legislation, there would be every session from ten to twenty bills which, if they were left to separate action, would have to pass this and the other body. The fault has not been with the committee. It has been with the Senate and the other House.

If I had known that I would have stirred up so much anxiety regarding the bill, I presume I should have submitted quietly and taken the chances when the bill came into the Senate to have corrected any irregularities which it might contain. I do not know that there are any that I want to correct; but I do want an opportunity to learn what the bill contains and to see what sins of omission there may be in relation to it. I venture to say they are greater than the sins of commission contained in it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not desire that I should be misunderstood. I did not intend to reflect on the committee or upon this bill. To have done so would have been most unjust, for I have not examined the bill. I desired merely to speak of my past experience in regard to Indian appropriation bills, on which I thought, and still think, there has been a great deal too much legislation. If the sins of the committee have been purely those of omission, I am quite content to let them stand uncorrected. I do not think we shall suffer from anything that is omitted in the way of legislation in an Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I wish to state for the committee, as criticism has been made of their action, that I think Senators will find, upon examination, the bill is very largely free from legislation. There are a few items put in the bill at the request of the Department of the Interior, which were absolutely necessary. As a member of the committee, I am proud of this Indian appropriation bill, and I think when it is read to the Senate, it will be generally approved by Senators, and they will be pleased to know that the bill reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs is so free from legislative items.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, in view of what has been said here, I merely wish to make an inquiry now about the first amendment to the bill. These amendments were being adopted without anybody paying any attention to them. It has been my misfortune rather than my fault that in the past two or three years I have had a good deal to criticise in the Indian appropriation bills. When the pending bill was being read a little while ago and amendments were being adopted, I had no opportunity to examine them, and I thought other Senators were similarly situated. Since we have been discussing this matter, I have had my attention called to the amendment at the top of page 3, which seems to me to need explanation. I will just simply explain what I mean. On page 2 of the bill the House sent to us there is a provision, as follows:

> That no purchase of supplies for which appropriations are herein or hereinafter made for the Indian Service exceeding in the aggregate $500 in value at any one time, shall be made without first giving at least three weeks' public notice by advertisement, etc.

I notice that the Senate committee have put in a proviso in the shape of an amendment, which reads:

> Provided, That hereafter supplies may be purchased, contracts let, and labor employed for the construction of artesian wells, ditches, and other works for irrigation, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, without advertising as hereinbefore provided.

Now, those words are the words which embrace the entire system or subject of irrigation. They turn the Secretary of the Interior absolutely loose without compelling him to advertise, and they allow him to make any contract he sees fit in his discretion. If that is a sample of the admirable work of the committee, I confess that I do not see it that way.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, while we have passed that point in the bill, nevertheless it is a pleasure to reply to the Senator from South Carolina, by quoting from page 8 of the report of the committee. Let me say in that connection that, since I assumed the chairmanship of the Committee on Indian Affairs, it has been the uniform practice to attach to each bill an index and to accompany each bill with a report as to every amendment, and the report also is indexed. This is the statement of the Indian Office referring to this particular amendment:

> Authority has been conferred in the appropriation acts for twelve or fourteen years for the Secretary of the Interior to purchase supplies, let contracts, and employ labor for irrigation, and a similar provision was in the estimates.
> This authority is of great convenience, especially in reservations remote from trade centers, as the laws governing this office in procuring supplies and materials require that the advertising shall run for a period of three weeks. The present form of the provision seems to be what is needed.

I might say in this connection that I think every amendment in this bill that is in any manner legislation has been reported at the request of the Department; and what I have read is the reason of the Department for this particular amendment, the explanation more in detail having been to the effect that this work is often done at a distance, where they can get no benefit from letting contracts, and they employ Indian labor to a very great extent. This is merely giving the Department a latitude that has been accorded them in the appropriation bills of the past. Whether that is a wise thing or not, is not a matter of criticism in any sense, but is a matter for the Senate, in its judgment, to determine.

Mr. TILLMAN. I merely called attention to the fact that the House had made a provision requiring advertisement when the amount involved exceeded $500. The Senate committee has provided an amendment which turns the Commissioner of Indian Affairs absolutely loose, without limitation or control, to make any kind of a contract he pleases and to allow him to make an agreement for work involving, perhaps, half a million dollars, or any other amount, without opportunity for competitors to bid for it. That is all there is to it.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the provision which places a limitation on the Secretary in the purchase of supplies without notice is the provision that applies to the general purchase of supplies for which appropriations are made.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then what good reason is there for turning him loose?

Mr. CLAPP. As I have already stated, this amendment applies to purchases, contracts, and labor for the construction of artesian well, ditches, and other works of irrigation.

Mr. TILLMAN. "Other works" embraces anything connected with irrigation.

Mr. CLAPP. That is true. It may be unwise to give the Secretary that authority, but it is a separate and distinct matter from the other provision and is carried out under entirely different conditions. The Department knows what supplies are required for the Indian schools of the country and the agencies of the country, and in their own good time and with deliberation they can sit down and make their estimates and then advertise for bids. They can not very well do that in the case of irrigation work, the extent of which they can not always anticipate when they undertake it. As I said before, that is a matter for the Senate, but there is a broad distinction between the two cases covered by the two provisions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BAILEY. What is the request?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request is that the unanimous-consent agreement be rescinded. Is there objection?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, as I understand, the unanimous-consent agreement was that the bill be read for the purpose of adopting the committee amendments. Now the Senator withdraws that request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request was that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered. Now the Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that that unanimous-consent agreement be set aside.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, that must be understood as being in accordance with the request of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will proceed with the formal reading of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, let the reading of the bill be commenced at the beginning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will call the attention of the Senate to the fact that during the reading under the unanimous-consent agreement a number of amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which those amendments were agreed to, so that this bill may be placed de novo before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Secretary will proceed with the reading.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill and read to the end of line 9 on page 13.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I suggest the want of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARTER in the chair). The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the intense zeal lately manifested to hear the reading of this bill leads me to make this suggestion, in view of the vacant seats on both sides of the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich	Cullom	Guggenheim	Scott
Allison	Curtis	Hale	Smith
Ankeny	Daniel	Heyburn	Stephenson
Bacon	Depew	Hopkins	Sutherland
Bailey	Dick	Knox	Taliaferro
Borah	Dixon	Long	Taylor
Bourne	Dolliver	McCreary	Teller
Brandegee	Flint	McEnery	Tillman
Bulkeley	Foraker	McLaurin	Warner
Burkett	Foster	Martin	Whyte
Burnham	Frazier	Overman
Clapp	Frye	Perkins
Clay	Gamble	Rayner

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is detained at his house by illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTIN in the chair). Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum is present. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask that we now proceed to read the bill for action on the amendments.

Mr. TILLMAN. There are only ten minutes left of the morning hour. I think it would be better to lay the bill aside.

Mr. TELLER. I suggest that we have only ten minutes left and it is hardly worth while to commence reading the bill for amendments.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is to speak at 2 o'clock. My only object was to use the interim. If anyone has anything else to offer, I would be glad to lay it aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate sundry bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

H. R. 4060. An act authorizing the extension of Oak street NW.;

H. R. 11767. An act to provide for the extension of Kenyon street from Seventeenth street to Mount Pleasant street, and for the extension of Seventeenth street from Kenyon street to Irving street, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

H. R. 11776. An act for the opening of Jefferson and Fifth streets NW., District of Columbia;

H. R. 12678. An act for the widening of Twentieth street NW., District of Columbia; and

H. R. 14772. An act prescribing what shall constitute a legal cord of wood in the District of Columbia.

H. R. 13077. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish four condemned brass cannon and cannon balls to the Confederate Monument Association at Franklin, Tenn., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

H. R. 16621. An act to extend the time for the construction of a dam across Savannah River at Cherokee Shoals was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] advises me that he is ready to proceed. In view of that, I ask that the Indian appropriation bill be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks that the Indian appropriation bill be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that Senate bill 3023 be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, in commenting on the financial bill, and in suggesting improvements in it, I do so with hesitancy and diffidence. I feel, however, that the long experience I have had in such matters justifies me in the hope that my comments upon this measure may not prove to be without some service to the Senate in a proper determination of this exceedingly important question.

In discussing this matter, Mr. President, it should always be kept in mind that it is not the welfare of the bank or of the depositor, however desirable these questions are in fact, that should be considered, but the real question to be considered is—

The prevention of panic.

The protection and promotion of our national commerce.

The firm establishment of stability in business affairs.

The maintenance in active operation of the productive energies of the Nation.

Panic is like a stampede in a theater at the cry of "fire." The remedy is, first, a fire-proof building; second, abundant avenues of escape, wide open.

Mr. President, I am in favor of a bond-secured emergency currency under an interest charge high enough to compel automatic contraction of such issue, and favor this principle in the measure reported by the committee.

I have listened with great interest to the explanatory comments of the chairman of the Committee on Finance in relation to the Senate bill 3023, as reported, and have studied with care and interest the bill which has been so submitted to the Senate by that committee.

There has been no subject of greater importance before Congress in years.

It is impossible to exaggerate the evil consequences to the commerce and industries of the United States by the four great panics we have had since the war—the panic of 1873, the panic of 1884, the panic of 1893, and the panic of 1907—and the various smaller financial disturbances of the same character, but not of the same violence, which have occurred from time to time.

FOUR STROKES OF NATIONAL COMMERCIAL PARALYSIS.

The disastrous effects of the panic of 1893 lasted for five distinct years.

These great financial disturbances not only ruin hundreds of thousands of individuals and destroy their financial and commercial life individually, but they exercise a wonderful repressing power on enterprises and make men unwilling to engage in enterprises of any kind because of the terrific history that can not be forgotten, where thousands of honest, industrious, prudent, and enterprising men have been ruined through no fault of their own.

There can be no greater evil to a land than the discouragement of individual enterprises extending wholesale throughout its boundaries. There can be no greater evil to a commercial nation than the paralysis of the productive energies of its individual members.

I am told that now in Pennsylvania one-half of the industries of that great State are silent and unemployed, losing millions of dollars that ought otherwise to be made, and which would be made except for the paralysis that has fallen upon that State, and other States in the Union are affected in like manner.

I deeply appreciate the great financial crisis from which the country is slowly emerging, and agree with the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee that this panic of 1907 "was the most acute and disastrous in its immediate consequences of any which has occurred in the history of the country;" that "the shrinkage in values of securities and property and the losses from injury to business resulting from and incident to the crisis amounted to thousands of millions of dollars."

I agree with him that "a complete disruption of the exchanges between cities and communities throughout the country took place."

That "it is impossible to estimate the losses which were inflicted by this suspension of payments by the banks and the resultant interruption of exchanges."

I pause to say that the actual contraction of exchanges in the panic of 1893, and in the panic of 1884, amounted to 50 per cent of the normal volume of exchanges. An examination of the reports of the Comptroller of the Currency exhibits this remarkable fact. When those exchanges are shrunken in that manner, it means the most serious consequences to the commerce of this country, because the exchanges which are now current in ordinary times will amount to nearly two thousand million dollars a day. I have tried to get the Comptroller of the Currency to make a proper inquiry into the volume of this exchange so that it might be definitely ascertained. It has not yet been done, but it ought to be done, as one of the facts essential to a proper comprehension of this great question. When we have a shrinkage of what might be called an ephemeral currency in the form of those exchanges of two thousand million dollars, it means an infinitely greater difficulty in getting hold of the dollar. It means that the dollar has a new purchasing power. It means that property loses its measure of value in relation to dollars.

I agree with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance in describing the recent financial panic, that "there was financial embarrassment on every hand and an impossibility of securing the proper funds to move crops or to carry on the ordinary business of the country."

That "the suspension or disarrangement of business operations threw thousands of men out of employment and reduced the wages of the employed."

I agree with him that "if the business interests of the country are left defenseless through the inaction of Congress the most serious consequences may follow."

That it is "the imperative duty of Congress in their wisdom to provide some means of escape from another calamitous crisis."

But I do not agree with his conclusion, that, because a comprehensive plan of legislation and reorganization of our entire banking system may not be conveniently entered upon at this time, the proposed remedies should be confined within the very narrow limits of the bill proposed by the Committee on Finance.

The arguments of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, showing the great evils which we have endured in the recent panic, and the serious consequences which must necessarily follow it, instead of laying a foundation for a very limited remedy gives the best of reasons why the remedy should be made as complete as possible. I confess that I feel deeply disappointed in the bill reported to the Senate.

The bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on Finance provides for bond-secured emergency circulation under a 6 per cent penalty, but confines the banks which may receive its benefits to only certain of the national banks, and to them only in a very limited way.

It makes the emergency notes national-bank notes in form without any wise reason.

It contains provisions for using railroad bonds for the basis of these notes, which I do not believe to be fair and just to the people of the United States, and it omits several provisions of the most important character which I deem of the highest consequence to the financial and commercial welfare of the United States.

Mr. President, I have submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by me which sets forth a fuller plan of relief, which I believe to be far superior to that offered by the Finance Committee, and to the provisions of which I earnestly invite the attention of the Senate.

While I shall insist upon the amendment which I intend to propose, believing that its provisions are of the greatest importance, I shall nevertheless feel impelled to give my vote to the bill as drawn by the Finance Committee, except its railroad-bond feature, if the Senate rejects the suggestions offered in the substitute I propose. I shall do so, Mr. President, however, on the ground that the committee bill does offer some measure of relief. It is better than no relief. The privilege given to railroad bonds is, however, entirely unjustified and utterly indefensible. I can not agree to give to railroad bonds a property denied to United States bonds. The committee measure gives to railroad bonds—mere bonds of corporations, owned by private persons—a value which ought to be given exclusively to public bonds, and denies this privilege to United States bonds. I deny that there is any justification for the introduction of railroad bonds in this bill. I deny the right of the Senate or of Congress to give away public values to private interests, and insist that such a policy is utterly indefensible. While this is true, Mr. President, it is also probably true that the harm done by the giving of this public value to private interests is less than the harm which would be done if this country should be left without any relief against future panic, and, at least, we shall have the opportunity of correcting this feature of the bill at some future time, if it be not now amended.

I shall, however, insist upon the amendment of the committee bill in this particular at the proper time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma will please suspend while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2982) to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Oklahoma will proceed.

A VALUABLE PRINCIPLE OF THE COMMITTEE MEASURE.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the principle of the committee bill which really has value, and the only principle which is of importance, is "emergency notes, secured by bonds, under a penalty higher than the normal rate of interest."

This is the essential and vital feature of the committee measure which gives it value, and this is the only principle of the bill which gives it value. This principle of finance has long been well understood and has long been in force in Europe.

In 1896 I studied this question and endeavored to write into the Democratic platform in Chicago the principle of currency notes to be issued against bonds as a remedy against panic.

The matter proceeded so far that the proposition was voted into the platform by the committee on resolutions and then was voted out because of the argument made against it that it was a novel proposition and untried.

There is no partnership in a measure of this character. It is purely an economic matter, or should be, and I should not be willing to have it assume a partisan form. I am referring to the position of the Democrats on that resolution committee. I do so, I think, to that extent, to the discredit of the intelligence of that committee on resolutions. But it lies with equal force against the other party and all parties in this country, that there has been no provision made for the maintenance of our commerce against this periodic disturbance, and what might be regarded by some and was regarded by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] as a necessary periodic question. I think it proper to call attention to the fact that the periodicity of panics in Europe, where they have a remedy similar to that now proposed by this committee, has ceased. There is no periodicity of panics there. You can have periodicity of panics whenever you allow a bear movement to agitate the country and have the country itself unprepared against the necessary excitement which that movement may create.

Subsequently to 1896 I gave this subject careful study, feeling a deep interest in the evil consequence of the panic of 1893. In 1898, in London, I discussed with the governors of the Bank of England the methods by which they controlled panic, and in Berlin consulted the officials of the Imperial Bank of Germany as to the method of avoiding panic in the German Empire. It was in this way I learned the complete efficiency of emergency notes which would automatically retire under a proper penalty. (See Appendixes A and B.)

Germany and Austria permit their Government banks to issue legal-tender emergency notes under penalty of 5 per cent, which is higher than the normal rate of interest, thus procuring automatic contraction of such emergency money.

In England, by ministerial permit, the Bank of England has been on several notable occasions, when panic threatened, authorized to issue emergency notes against other securities than gold in violation of the English bank act of 1844, and such emergency notes, being used in violation of the statute, necessarily are withdrawn at the first moment possible to the public safety.

When the Senator from Rhode Island, on the 18th of December, in answer to the Senator from Texas, said that "legislation can not prevent the recurrence of similar crises in the future," I was astonished, Mr. President, because the sentiment expressed by the Senator from Rhode Island was at variance with the experience of the leading nations of Europe and was contrary to sound reason.

I have long been thoroughly satisfied that it is a perfectly easy matter to prevent panics in this country. I have observed, however, Mr. President, with interest that the chairman of the Committee on Finance had evidently changed his views with regard to this matter when he introduced a bill on January 7, 1908, for the avowed purpose of preventing panic and was gratified when the chairman of the Committee on Finance, on February 10, said:

> But the serious defect of our monetary system, as disclosed by our recent bitter experience, is the fact that we have no means whatever for providing the additional issues necessary to meet or to prevent panic conditions.

And when he further said, in closing his remarks, that—

> If we should fail to take some effective action to provide against such crises such as that through which we have just passed, we should assume a grave responsibility.

Mr. President, the measure proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Finance was particularly interesting to me because it contains the correct principle, to wit, quick emergency money on bonds under a penalty which would insure its automatic contraction.

Mr. President, the favorable view of the chairman of the Committee on Finance on this subject is a matter of the greatest value to the country, and I call his attention to the fact that he has adopted the essential principle in the bill reported by his committee, which was contained in an amendment which I had the honor to draft, and which was introduced in the United States Senate on February 6, 1900, by Hon. James K. Jones, and which was proposed as an amendment to the financial bill in charge of the Senator from Rhode Island, then as now, chairman of the Finance Committee.

Mr. President, I send to the Clerk's desk a letter from Senator Jones, with a copy of amendment referred to, which I shall ask the Clerk to read:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Law offices of James K. Jones and James K. Jones, jr., 621, 622 Colorado Building. Telephone Main 638.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 11, 1908.

Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN, United States Senate, City.

DEAR SENATOR: I inclose a copy of the amendment which I offered to the financial bill on February 6, 1900 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 1534).

You will, of course, recall the fact that you prepared the original draft of this proposed amendment, which I introduced in almost, if not in exactly, the form submitted by you. I think you will find the debate on that bill at that time quite interesting.

If that amendment had been adopted at that time and it had been written in the law, it would, in my opinion, have prevented the late panic.

I am glad to see that at last the principle of an emergency currency properly secured is recognized and that the Committee on Finance of the Senate indorse it.

Congratulating you on your early connection with this idea, I am,

Very sincerely, yours,

JAMES K. JONES.

Amendment proposed by James K. Jones, February 6, 1900:
